Do You Like Food with Your Meals?

George Ade has a great fable in slang in September Cosmopolitan. If you like food with your meals, you will smile your way through this latest whimsy of Indiana's philosopher-humorist.

This is the bill of fare of the Staff-ers, according to George Ade: Fourteen to sixteen spare-ribs smothered with kraut, four or five helpings of fresh vegetables, a few light biscuits inslaid with gold-butter, and possibly a quarter of a mile of noodles, spiced peaches, frosty doughnuts, a little quart bowl of preserved cherries, to say nothing of coffee curdled with cream, etc.

If you haven't an appetite and want to work up one, or if you have an appetite and cannot afford to satisfy it, read this fable, which is as good as a square meal.

Look for the "Fable of the Waist-band that was Taut up to the Moment it gave Way," in September Metropolitan.

Anniversary services will be held on Sunday next, Sept. 9th, in the Methodist church at Hart's at 11 o'clock a.m. and 7:30 p.m. The preacher will be the Rev. W. P. Woodger, B.A., of Marmora.

Events of The War in Brief

Disaster on Russian front and unimpeded advance on the Italian front summarizes this week's war news. By the capture of the port of Riga, the Germans have fairly well completed their control of the Baltic and opened the way to Petrograd. What is more serious is the fact that the Russian forces, the infantry part at least, seem to have made no real assistance. More serious still, if true, is the report that a plot for the arrest of the whole Provisional Government, by those who desire the Czar's restoration, nearly succeeded.

On the Italian front remarkable progress is still being made, nearly 130,000 Austrian prisoners having been taken in the last few weeks. The Austrian fleet is, too, now bottled up in Pola.

On the Western front, although Canadian casualties alone cover nearly a newspaper page daily, a practical deadlock appears to continue.

107 prisoners were killed and 92 others injured in an air-raid by the Germans over the Isle of Thanet on Tuesday. 6 aeroplanes took part.

Letters from Our Soldiers

The following letter was received by Mrs. Geo. Taylor, a former resident of Madoc, from her son:

Edinburgh, July 15th.

MY DEAR MOTHER,—

This isn't going to be a long letter because as you see we are on leave and in a place where there is so much to see and so little time to do it in. We got leave Thursday night and as I am getting Earl transferred thought I might as well come here. We got here Friday 8 a.m. and I had Harold Johnson run down before 10.45, and, mind you, I didn't know his number, square or anything. I knew he was on some square and found all the names in the directory so I knew when I saw it that St. Andrew's square somewhere would get him. I walked around 4 times and found they had moved so at last I saw Canadian Forestry Corps in a lobby and found him up four flights.

I have seen some very pretty and interesting towns and cities in the last two years but the one I am in now is the best yet for prettiness, expensive buildings and everything so ancient. Friday p.m. I went over to the Forth Bridge. It is one of the wonders of the world, a huge structure, spans 1 mile long. Yesterday had myself photographed, afterwards went through Edinburgh castle, a very ancient building. St. Margaret's chapel is still used for baptizing soldiers' children and dates back to 1093 A.D. The banquet hall is full of arms and armour, everything the old Scotch kings used. Mary Queen of Scots' bedroom was interesting, quite small. It was here James the First was born and lowered out of the window to be taken away to educate him in the Roman Catholic faith. Harold took us through the Britannic gardens this a.m. It was simply beautiful. Of course we didn't see them all for it takes over a day. The Scotch girls are good girls, only too glad to show us around. Must conclude.

PTB. HARRY TAYLOR.

The following letter was received by Mr. James Kincaid from Rev. Walter Smart, a former Methodist preacher at Queensboro:

London, Eng., Aug. 12th.

DEAR FRIENDS,—

A few lines from across the ocean will likely interest you. I am here in a big camp called Witley, not far from London. We are working hard, up early and late. We are practicing all the real war tactics. We put on our gas masks and pass through real gas. We throw bombs and have sham battles. The scenery of England is very beautiful. The large climbing rose bushes all over the frontages of the humblest cottage are very picturesque. The great oak trees are all covered with clinging ivy and the hedges are very neat running along both sides of the asphalt roads. Even country roads are paved. Stone and tar is what they use. I had a 4 days' pass recently and was in London and Edinburgh. The 400-mile railway trip to Edinburgh was very entertaining, lovely farm scenes all the way. The harvests here are fine and all fear of a famine is past. We get a lot of nutrients to eat, plenty of potatoes now. Hardly any sugar sweets are used in the camp and the boys miss it very much. I don't use sugar in my tea, you will perhaps remember, so I don't mind it as much as some. Mrs. Smart and children are well and living at Bethany still. Glad to hear the news from you sometimes.

WALTER SMART.

The following letter is from a prisoner in Germany to the Secretary of the Queensboro Patriotic League:

June 2nd.

DEAR FRIEND,—

I have not heard from you for a long time. I hope you are all in the best of health. It is just one year to-day since I had my misfortune but I hope it will not go on much longer. Am keeping very good but my hand gives me a lot of pain at times through the fingers being off. It might have been worse but am glad to say it was not. Would like you to send me some tobacco and cigarettes. I am getting bread from Queensboro Patriotic League. Thank them for same. It comes through the Red Cross. Best respects to all. Write soon.

PTB. GEO. MCKIE.

The following letter was written to Colonel Ponton and refers to Queensboro Patriotic League:

August 9th.

DEAR COLONEL,—

I should like you to convey to the ladies of Queensboro, Ontario, the most cordial thanks of the County of Hastings boys in the 2nd Battalion for their generous gift of comforts and cigarettes which were duly received. Nothing is calculated to trace up the spirits of the men more than the conviction that our people at home bear us continually in their minds and are always taking the liveliest interest in our welfare.

This conviction substantiated by the very appropriate and thoughtful gift of the ladies of Queensboro is a source of real assistance and in no small way helps us to bear the rigours of a very hard campaign with considerably more equanimity and cheerfulness than would otherwise be the case.

Again please accept the hearty

FRED MARTIN NELSON

The above are the three Lepalm brothers, of the 20th N. B. Battalion, formerly of Queensboro, who are doing their bit for King and country and are a fine example for others to follow.

On the right—412338 Sgt. Fred Lepalm has been serving with the colors since February, 1915, and has seen 22 months' service in the trenches and in that time has been engaged in every battle that took place from June 1st, 1916, up to the present day.

In the center—413023 Pte. Martin Lepalm has also seen considerable service in France. He enlisted in March, 1915, went to France in October, 1915, and went through everything up to the Somme battle on September 15th where he was severely wounded and has been in hospital ever since.

On the left—413022 Pte. Nelson Lepalm enlisted the same time as Martin in March, 1915, served in France for over eight months, went through the third battle of Ypres unscathed and up to the beginning of the big offensive on July 1st, 1916, when he was wounded in a French raid on the enemy.

In Memoriam

Sergt. John Edward Burns, of the 24th Battalion, France, died of wounds received at Hill 70 on August 13th. Such was the word received by Joseph Burns, of Madoc, on Wednesday, August 22, 1917.

Sergt. Burns was born twenty-three years ago the 25th of November and lived his lifetime in Madoc village, received his education in Madoc Public and High Schools. He was a particularly clever student at school, having received his Second Class certificate long before he was old enough to teach. For two years before the war he acted as teacher in a Public School and had a most bright and promising future before him, but the call came for men and he answered and enlisted in the 38th Battalion in December, 1914, and went to England June 23rd, 1915, and over to France in December where he has been since in the 24th Battalion.

He has been through many battles and was wounded at St. Eloi. He recovered in time to fight at Courcellette, all through the Somme, over Vimy Ridge and up to Lens, and for nineteen months he fought the Hun that his friends might have liberty and freedom.

He was recommended for the D.C.M. but did not live to receive it, but as his comrade in the army has said, "What is a medal? He has left a better name, and made greater sacrifice than all the medals in the world. He has paid the supreme price and died a hero. The sympathy of the whole community is extended to his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Burns, James, his brother, of Elk Lake, New Ontario, and his sisters, Misses Kathleen and Jean, of Madoc. Eddie was loved by all who knew him as an upright, honest and fair-minded young man. He was a Presbyterian in faith and Conservative in politics, and we feel that he has died a hero, and when the roll is called up yonder and we all muster at the great white throne, we shall meet him and know him again.—Ontario.

Food Controller or Packers to Blame

Either the Food Controller has misled the people of Canada or the British Government has shut down on Canadian bacon because Canadian packers have dealt unfairly with it, says the Gazette, the leading Government organ. This editorial reads:

"The announcement that the British Government will buy no more Canadian hogs or bacon comes as something of a surprise.

"If the British Government, as stated, will buy no more Canadian pork it means that Great Britain is in a position to do without it. If that is the case then somebody has misled the Food Controller, who in turn misled the Canadian people. It is not to be supposed that the Canadian Food Controller would point to the Canadian people an imaginary and fictitious food situation.

"There is a possible though unpleasant and unwelcome explanation, namely, that Canadian packers have dealt unfairly with the British Government; that the British Government has found it out, and that the sudden embargo on imports of Canadian pork is a disciplinary measure.

BACK TO THE SOIL.

Lure of Nature to the Country Bred Telling in the Cities.

Life in the city is coming more and more to seem an unnatural exile, particularly to the country bred, at whose heartstrings boyish memories of farm and orchard, of wood and stream, tug appealingly, making pictures to the inner eye as of lost paradises as they sit imprisoned in their palaces, slaves to the telephone and the ticker.

More and more such men are planning to escape, vowing to themselves that they will rest satisfied with the modest competence rather than the big fortune, so that they can pull out while they still have some youth left and the boys again in the countryside, fish the old streams, and go con hunting in the old woods. I know many men with that ambition.

For a man who has been exiled in the city for a number of years, having during that time had no more intimate acquaintance with nature than to be snatched in his annual holiday at some fashionable beach or some luxurious hotel in the mountains—for such a one to watch the coming of spring, day after day, in a stretch of old woodland to come as near to the recapture of youth as is possible in a world whose one irremediable sorrow is the inescapable doom of growing old.—Richard Le Gallienne in Harper's Magazine.

FIRE ESCAPES FOR SCHOOLS.

These Serve as a Play Scheme as Well as a Protection.

Some of the California schools are equipped with novel fire escapes, which are not only a safeguard, but afford the children as much amusement as a regular playground equipment. One of these fire escapes in Tropic, near Los Angeles, consists of several long sheet metal chutes, reinforced with angle iron and secured to the walls of the building. They extend from an iron platform on the second floor, which leads from the main corridor. Separate chutes are provided for the boys and girls.

The teachers encourage the use of the slides as an amusement to accustom the children to them. Each slide ends in a slight upward curve to check the momentum of the descent. At the point where the children reach the ground a pile of loose sand breaks the fall.

In Venice, Cal., a spiral chute is employed, which is inclosed in a cylindrical metal casing. This is entered from a platform leading from the upper story. Like the straight slide, it is used as an amusement device by the pupils. A local hospital makes use of one of the same design.

Futility of "No Trespass" Signs.

In the American Magazine David Grayson comments as follows on a farmer who covered his land with "No Trespass" signs:

"I did not need to enter his fields, nor climb his hill, nor walk by his brook. But as the springs passed and the autumn whitened into winter I came into more and more complete possession of all those fields that he so jealously posted. I looked with strange joy upon his hill, saw April blossom in his orchard and May color the wild grape leaves along his walls. June I snuggled in the sweet vernal of his hay fields, and from the October of his maples and beeches I gathered rich crops—and put up no hostile signs of ownership, paid no taxes, worried over no mortgage and often marveled that he should be so poor within his posted domain and I so rich without."

Combs and the Hair.

The best comb for the hair is the hard rubber comb with smooth, rounded edges that will not cut the hair. A fine comb has many disadvantages; therefore the all purpose comb is to be preferred. A metal tooth comb tends to pull out good hair and is liable to wound and scratch the scalp. Never use a comb the teeth of which are broken. One should never try to save money at the expense of a good comb. The comb should be washed frequently in water in which ammonia has been added. Scrub out the teeth with a nail brush and soap. A sun bath is also good for the comb.

Perfectly Natural.

Robust Old Gentleman to sick woman just arrived at health resort—When I first came here I hadn't strength to utter a word; I had scarcely a hair on my head; I couldn't walk across the room, and I had to be lifted from my bed.

Sick Woman—You give me great hope. How were you cured?

Robust Old Gentleman—I was born here.

Enlisting a Golfer's Aid.

"I hung a few rugs on the line yesterday."

"Well?"

"Then I got my husband's midiron and told him to go out in the yard and practice a few golf swings on them."

A Popular Recreation.

"Where are you going, Sandy?" said one Scotchman to another.

"Down to the club," said Sandy.

"And what for?"

"Just to contradict a wee bit."

Energetic Influence.

"Does your wife find politics interesting?"

"Not as interesting as she expects to make it before she gets through with it."

Adversity sometimes gives a man courage; prosperity too often takes it out of him.

CHICKEN CHATTER.

Not enough about feed lack of exercise and too much confinement are all causes of leg weakness with the early hatched chicks.

Use care in making a sitting hen's nest. Put in some dirt first, then plenty of soft hay or oat straw.

When hatching watch closely that the chicks do not get away from the hen and chill.

Chicks must have all the water they want from the start of feeding.

For the first two weeks feed chicks hard boiled eggs, cut up fine; coarse cornmeal, grit and a good quality of chick food.

BROODER IMPORTANT.

Where Large Numbers of Chicks Are Raised It Is Indispensable.

That the importance of the brooder in rearing large numbers of incubator chicks cannot be overestimated is the opinion of N. L. Harris, superintendent of the Kansas State Agricultural college poultry farm.

Some artificial means of brooding chicks must be provided when incubator chicks hatch in cool or cold weather. Where a small flock of birds is to be raised it is not profitable to use either the incubator or brooder, but where large numbers of chickens are handled the brooder becomes a matter of convenience.

Keeping chicks in large flocks minimizes the labor and reduces the cost of houses and yards. Where hens are used for brooders in cold weather only a few chicks can be given to each hen. This requires a large number of coops, and the attendant is compelled to give each group nearly as much attention as would be required for one large flock cared for by the brooder.

A large percentage of the hen brooded chicks suffer from the effects of head lice. These not only are bothersome to the newly hatched chick, but continue to be a source of trouble through the entire season.

Where hens are not available and only a few chicks are to be raised it is possible to construct a homemade brooder. These usually require considerably more attention than those on the market, but will give fairly good results.

The chicken coop and screened run shown herewith provide safety for the hen and chicks from predatory foes. The wire screen is an effective barrier against hawks, cats, rats and other foes of chicks.

The most common method of heating these homemade brooders is by means of a jug of hot water. A box which contains sufficient room for from 50 to 100 chicks and which is tight on all sides excepting the front is the first requirement. Some method of ventilation should be provided on the top of the box. A two gallon jug of hot water furnishes the heating plant. The jug should be wrapped in burlap to protect the chicks and aid in retaining the heat. This brooder will keep a limited number of chicks perfectly comfortable.

There are nearly as many makes of brooders on the market as there are incubator factories in the country. Many of these brooders are so cheaply constructed as to be in constant danger of fire. Many small brooders are on the market, however, which are practically fireproof and which have a capacity of from 50 to 100 chicks.

Care of Chicks.

Provide the chicks with clean fresh water until they are a month or six weeks old.

After the first few days feed daily cut onions, green alfalfa, sprouted oats or some other suitable green feed unless chicks can get such material on range.

Feed charcoal, grit and bonemeal separately in a suitable feed hopper. Plenty of exercise on range and plenty of green feed and bonemeal will prevent leg weakness.

The picking or cannibalism can be prevented by providing plenty of animal food, green feed, exercise and by putting a little salt in the mash, not over one-half of 1 per cent.

Skim milk or buttermilk given the chicks to drink in a sanitary drinking vessel is excellent for promoting uniform and rapid growth and is one of the best preventives of bowel trouble.—Iowa Agricultural College.

Spade Up the Run.

If you are keeping your chicks confined in small runs be sure to either move them frequently or spade over the ground, mixing some slacked lime with the turned over soil. This will prevent the soil from becoming foul.

GREAT VALUE OF TIN.

It is Indispensable, and There is No Substitute For It.

Nickel and tin are the only important metals that have not been found in paying quantities among our mineral resources, although the fact that they are the largest consumers of tin plate in the world has stimulated the search. Tin ore in small quantities has been found in several places in the United States, but most of what we use comes from Cornwall, in England; Banca, in the East Indies, and Malacca, in southern Asia.

Tin is a metal that has played an important part in the history of the world. Combined with copper to make bronze, it was doubtless the first metal that man converted to his use. Weapons, tools and utensils made of bronze were used during a long period before iron and steel came into use. The United States now uses in the manufacture of tin cans as much tin plate as all other countries together use for all purposes.

There is no substitute for tin. Price has little effect on consumption, which is not true of other metals. If tin cost 15 cents a pound we should perhaps put a thicker coating on our plates and make better solder and babbitt metal, but if it were a dollar a pound we should still have to use it for nearly every one of the purposes for which it is now employed.

The lack of tin is one of the few things that keep the United States from being self sufficient. If we were suddenly deprived of our supply of tin and solder we should soon have serious sanitary troubles.

EXPERTS IN THE WATER.

The Japanese Are Masters of Many Tricks of Swimming.

The Japanese are extremely fond of swimming, and among the younger generation of students and the coast population there are some splendid long distance swimmers. Schools of natation teach the art in a systematic manner, and although the best racing records of Japan are not equal to the western, a Japanese expert can perform some truly wonderful feats. For example, he can jump into deep water and maintain his position with the water no higher than the loins, while he fires a gun, writes on a slate, paints a picture on a fan with a brush or moves freely in every direction as if he were walking on solid ground.

The expert, while he rarely emulates the graceful high dive of the American or the European, can leap from a great height and strike the surface of the water with his chest without sinking or wetting his face and head. In some mysterious way he contrives to escape the painful consequences which the impact would inevitably cause to the foreigner who should try this feat. It is said that the old time samurai frequently made use of this trick when crossing a river or stream. In such cases they carried their armor and weapons on their heads.

The famous "crawl" stroke, which occidental swimmers first acquired not very long ago, has been known and practiced in Japan for hundreds of years.

Superstitions of the Sea.

The persons who sail as passengers on a ship which does not regularly carry passengers are looked upon either with favor or disfavor by the crew. The presence of a child is thought to be a good omen, while women are believed to bring bad luck. Lawyers are looked upon with greatest dislike, for they are considered particularly unlucky. The name "sea lawyer" is the worst term one sailor can use toward another.

A cat on board ship is supposed to cause the vessel to meet with gales. The old saying is, "A cat carries a gale in her tail," and the average sailor believes that when a cat frisks about the deck she is raising a storm. Pigs also have a bad reputation on shipboard.

A Pathetic Shipboard.

Perhaps one of the saddest of the many benefits which have been celebrated at Barry Lane was that given on June 27, 1928, for Grimaldi, the greatest clown the stage has known, when the heartbroken old man was wheeled on to the stage in an armchair and hopelessly broke down in his endeavor to sing his once famous ditty, "Hot Coddins."

The old man's memory had completely forsaken him. On that occasion a sum of $1,700 was realized, which for many years remained a record.

Pure Reason.

In his essay "Perpetual Peace," published in 1795, Immanuel Kant declared that we can never have universal peace until the world is politically organized, and it will never be possible to organize the world politically until the people, not the kings, rule. And he added that the peoples of the earth must cultivate and attain the spirit of hospitality and good will toward all races and nations.

Of Course It Can't Be Done.

Of course well informed people know better, but there are some ignorant folks who think it is possible to have a good time without spending more than they can afford.—Claude Allen in Port Worth Star-Telegram.

Never Finished.

He (anxiously)—About how long, darling, will it take to complete your trousseau? She—All the rest of my married life.—Exchange.

Ignorance is the primary source of all misery and vice.

SWITZERLAND'S TROUBLES.

Many Deserters Have Sought Refuge in Republic.

Between 10,000 and 12,000 deserters from the armies of the Entente Allies and the Central Powers have fled to Switzerland since the beginning of the war, or have refused to leave the country at the conclusion of hostilities and thus are classed as deserters. The majority are said to be Italians.

The long list constitutes a not inconsiderable problem for the authorities. They enjoy the same rights as other foreigners who are here legitimately, yet cannot be drawn on in any way for taxes or state expenses. They pay no military tax of immunity, and not infrequently commit deeds that make it necessary to send them to jail—where their support naturally falls on the confederation.

As a problem they may be said to rank in vexatiousness with the innumerable and constant violations of neutrality which come to light almost daily, especially on the part of the French and the Germans.

The general staff of the army announces on an average a dozen aerial violations a week by aviators who "cut across lots" on the way to or from France or Germany, and who cross the little neck of Switzerland that juts up into both countries in the north-west corner of the country. This little neck also is weekly the target for both French and German shells. The gunners, far behind the lines set wrong ranges and "shoot up" Swiss territory before they can be told of their mistake.

Less often, but occasionally, prisoners of war attempt to escape either from Germany or France, and are shot and killed after they have reached Swiss territory, or else the pursuing shots crash over into Swiss territory and menace those on this side.

It is generally the case that fugitives who do manage to reach this side regardless of where they come from, are royally and handsomely treated. Recently four Russians escaped from Germany, swam the Rhine, and landed on Swiss soil. They were met by a veritable reception committee on the other side, were given a meal that satisfied even their enormous, starved appetites, and were generally fettered and being escorted to an internment camp where they will spend the rest of the war.

Keeping Track of Time.

Each boundary rider on the immense sheep ranches of Australia has a district to look after, and he has to keep the wire fences in repair and see that the sheep come to no harm. It is a hard lonely life, in which the rider rarely sees another human being. Many of the men have strange ways of keeping count of the days.

One rider named Eagan tried several plans to keep count of the days, but always failed. At length he hit on a novel and attractive method. He made a big damper—the name the Australians give to a cake of flour and water with a seasoning of salt—on Sunday, and marked it into seven parts. Each section was a day's allowance, and the slices that remained told him the number of days that must pass before Sunday came again.

For several weeks this method never failed him. Unfortunately, one Tuesday he fell in with a fellow-rider who was very hungry. Eagan stinted himself in order that the ravenous one might be satisfied with that day's section of the damper. But it was no use. The host saw the knife cut the boundary-line and the hungry rider carved into the almanac. He could stand it no longer.

"Stop, now, stop!" he yelled as he clutched the remains of the damper and glared at his visitor. "There," he went on, "you've eaten Tuesday and you've eaten Wednesday, and now you want to slice the best of the mornin' off Thursday! Not if I can stop it, sonny! I won't be knowing the day of the week!"

Custody of Hun Colonies.

Suggestions that the United States should govern various disputed lands as the trustee for civilization are being advanced by European publicists with increasing frequency. The destinies of Palestine, Syria, and even the Suez Canal have been thus arranged by enthusiasts. Josiah Wedgwood, who was on the staff of General Smuts in East Africa last year, proposes in an article in the Nation to give the United States the largest order yet framed.

All German African colonies, Mr. Wedgwood says, should be pooled with the Congo Free State and the Portuguese colonies by the payment of 100,000,000 pounds sterling to Belgium, and 20,000,000 pounds to Portugal. This territory, of 4,700,000 square miles, should be administered by an American commission, similar to the Philippine commission, but nominated by the guaranteeing powers, with "equal opportunities for all whites, free trade, and a progressive non-exploiting land policy up to the best modern American pattern as exhibited in the Philippines."

They Broke the China.

Surely the irony of circumstance could not have been carried further than at a luncheon recently given to Sir Edward Carson by the British Empire Producers' Organization. Let the title be noted. Lord Bessford was one of the guests, and, in the midst of a speech full of character, energy and plain speaking, his eye suddenly caught the inscription on one of the plates, off which he had been lunching. As this inscription took definite shape, he was horrified to find that it read, "Factory, Wenden, Germany." "Here's a pretty state of affairs," he cried. "We have actually been dining off German plates!" A moment's terrible silence was followed, almost immediately, by the sound of breaking crockery all over the room. There is surely a humor in the situation which makes it worth while, from almost any point of view.

Loyalty.

Loyalty to our country is good, but loyalty to our town and our neighbors is just as important, although rarer. To send money out of town for things that may be obtained from townsmen and neighbors is not loyal, and does a serious injury to our schools, churches, and other institutions supported by local taxation or philanthropy.

Support good roads, good churches and good schools. Spend your money at home. You will get just as good or better value, and can see what you buy before you pay for it, instead of after. Read the advertisements and deal at home.

Institute Garden Party

The Garden Party, given by the members of the Madoc Women's Institute on August 24th at Hawthornden, was a brilliant success. The grounds were well illuminated with electric lights interspersed with Japanese lanterns. This work was artistically done by our talented young electrician, Mr. John Burkitt. The evening was all that could be desired and the gay crowd of laughing boys and girls, as well as the more sedate adults, all enjoyed the social intercourse, as well as the splendid music supplied by the Madoc and Sulphide bands. The refreshments served won well-merited praise, and as lemonade, ice-cream and home-made candy could be obtained on the grounds there seemed nothing left to wish for. The strains of the National Anthem announced all too soon that one of the most enjoyable evenings of the season was brought to a close. The proceeds, which will be used for patriotic purposes, amounted to $100.18.

Queensboro Patriotic League

The Queensboro League celebrated the third anniversary of their entry into war work by giving an entertainment in the Orange Hall in aid of the Prisoner of War Fund on Thursday evening. Although the weatherman was most unkind a good attendance proved the popularity of the cause. Mr. Sills, of Madoc, provided the entertainment and his music was very much appreciated. Miss Greta Thompson, of Belleville, also contributed much to the enjoyment of the evening by her songs, and Mr. W. Shane, of Belleville, also sang very acceptably. The proceeds amounted to over $31 which will provide bread for a prisoner for one year at present prices. Mrs. A. Howe donated a quilt which was sold for $10.10. A card was read from Prisoner Geo. McKee saying he is receiving the bread sent by the League through the Red Cross. The following summary of the work for the 3 years was read: Cash gifts—To Naval Hospital, Aug. 22, 1914, $50, comforts for Hastings Co. men, $150; British Red Cross, 1915, $150; British Red Cross, 1916, $230; Toronto University Hospital $20; Prisoner of war $45; 155th Band $10; Can. Red Cross, from S. S. No. 5, Elzevir, $10; Belgian Relief Fund, from W. B. Northrup, $5, total $870. Socks shipped—1915, 297 pairs; 1916, 250 pairs; 1917, 339 pairs to August 23rd; total 796 pairs. Of these 155 pairs were sent in soldiers' parcels. Hospital shirts—1915, 183; 1916, 385; 1917, 24; total 592. Bandages—1915, 156. Fruit—1915, 38 pint jars. Pyjamas—1916, 69 suits; 1917, 90 suits, total 159 suits. Parcels sent by League Christmas, 1916, 42.

A very pretty wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Archibald Thompson at 11.30 a.m. on August 22nd, when their youngest daughter, Tillie, Blanche, and Rev. Stanley Edgar Morton, M.A., were united in marriage by Rev. A. E. Smart.

The bridal party entered the drawing-room, which was decorated with goldenrod, as Mendelssohn wedding march was played by Mrs. Newton Pincock, L.I.C.M. The bride, who was given away by her father, looked very sweet in a gown of ivory silk trimmed with real lace and the wedding veil of Dutch cut. She carried a shower bouquet of pink roses and white sweet peas and wore the groom's gift, a gold wrist watch. Hazel Thompson, a little niece, was flower girl. During the signing of the register, Miss Grace Aylsworth sang "Because." A dainty luncheon was served by the bride's girl friends.

The guests from a distance were Mrs. C. E. Waterhouse, of Toronto, sister of the groom; the bride's sister, Mrs. Monilays McNeill, of Calgary; and brother, John, of Winnipeg.

The newly married couple left for Muskoka. The bride's travelling suit was navy blue with champagne hat. On their return Rev. and Mrs. Morton will reside at the rectory, Belleville.

Madoc Fair

Oct. 2nd and 3rd

When the Rev. W. B. Tucker delivered the address to the Masonic brethren of Madoc Lodge A.F. & A.M. on the occasion of their last celebration of St. John, he took for the text of his discourse a cube, and in pointing out the symbolism of the breadth of the cube he applied it to the extension of a man's activities to other interests than a total concentration of his energies upon his chosen vocation. He clearly pointed out that it was the bounden duty of every citizen to assist either financially or by his intellectual or manual labour every enterprise that had for its object the welfare of the community in which he lives. In accordance with this conception of a man's duties it is imperative that everyone residing in the district covered by Madoc Agricultural Society must in some way assist in its upkeep of this society or be dubbed a slacker.

The secretary informs the Review that there are not at present 100 names on the membership list. Surely this is a condition of affairs far from creditable to the intelligence and local pride of the people of Centre Hastings. If there is one purely local enterprise more than another that is deserving of the fullest sympathy and intelligent assistance at the present time of all it is a society that has for its prime object an improvement in the quality and an increase in the quantity of the food supplies of the world. A one dollar bill mailed to the Secretary will make you a member of this very deserving society, will qualify you to make as many entries as you wish and to enter the fair any time during the whole exposition. It will also help to make Madoc Fair more successful and will show that you are doing your part in making a deserving institution more serviceable to the community.

END OF A DYNASTY

The Rise and Fall of the Russian House of Romanoff.

FROM THE LION TO THE LAMB.

A Line of Czars, Mad, Bad, Liberal or Despotic, but All Strong and Daring. That Died When Nicholas II., Weak and Timid, Was Flung Aside.

When the house of Romanoff fell with the abdication of Nicholas II., the czar of Russia, there came to an end one of the most extraordinary dynasties in the history of the world, a dynasty that took a stretch of fiftynine years and turned it into an empire flung across two continents and occupying one-sixth of the land space of the world. It was the hereditary line that produced Peter the Great and the remarkable Catherine and many other virile and vigorous characters, cruel, yet efficient; wanton, yet successful.

Probably no dynasty in Europe produced so many strong figures as the house of Romanoff. Yet when it fell it was not due so much to the wrath of downtrodden, betrayed people as to the inherent weakness and shrinking meekness of the czar.

Imagine Peter or Ivan the Terrible or even Alexander of recent memory speaking as Nicholas did when informed that an outbreak had occurred in Petrograd:

"Let it be so. Thank God. I will abdicate if that is what the people want. I will go to Livadia (the imperial estate in Crimea), to my gardens, to the people want. I am so fond of flowers."

While the first Romanoff to rule over Russia was not crowned until 1613, the family had become one of influence in Muscovy in the thirteenth century. At that time Ivan Divnoyich held an important post at the court of the grand duke of Moscow. A daughter of Romanoff, sixth in descent from Ivan, married Ivan the Terrible, whose chief ambition was to watch people dying between courses at his banquets. Romanoff's successors called themselves Romanoffs.

The old Tartar dynasty in Russia came to an end in 1598. During the next few years half a dozen pretenders ravaged the country. The Swedes cut in on the north and the Poles on the west. Then the common folk and gentry of Russia met in a convention at Moscow, and elected Michael Romanoff czar of the Russian. It is a peculiar coincidence that an assembly of the people chose the first of the Romanoffs and deposed the last of them.

There followed a line of mad czars, bad czars, liberal czars, reactionary czars, Peters, Catharines, Elizabeths and Alexanders, all men and women of virility and strength of mind regardless of their other failings. They ruled by force of personal strength.

This is the descent of the recently deposed Czar Nicholas—a lamb foaled in a nest of tigers and lionesses. Count Paul Vassili, who spent two score years at the court of Petrograd and who had an intimate view of three czars, in his personal memoirs, composed shortly before his death a few years ago, had this to say of Nicholas:

"Nicholas II. is one of those timid, weak natures which nevertheless like to assert themselves at certain moments in matters utterly without importance, but which to their eyes appear to be vital ones. His mind is as small as his person. He sees the biggest events go by without being touched or being even aware of their great or tragic sides."

"He likes to be feared, but he cannot inspire respect, much less awe. He feels this, and, not knowing how to fight against this lack of consideration of his person, he becomes savage in his wrath and, though in appearance a quiet, inoffensive little man, is capable of the utmost cruelty and hardness."

"When the news was brought to him of the terrible disaster at Tashima, which cost Russia the greater part of her navy, the czar was playing tennis in the park of Tsarskoe Selo. He read the telegram that sounded the death-knell of so many hopes and then quietly resumed the game."

"When he found himself confronted with the revolution of 1906 it never occurred to him that he might avert it by putting his own person forward. On that dreadful day in January which ended in such bloodshed he never for a moment remembered the proud attitude of his ancestor, that other Nicholas who on an almost similar occasion came out of the palace and confronted the angry crowd, forcing the multitude by his mere presence to fall to their knees and submit."

"The only thought of the czar was to flee from danger and leave to others the task of smothering the revolution in blood."

An incident reported in 1916 gives an insight to the physical courage of the ex-czar, or, rather, the lack of it. The account at the time said:

"The emperor was reviewing the troops of General Brusiloff on the Bukovina front when an Austrian flyer appeared overhead and dropped bombs some distance from the czar. Nicholas entirely lost his self-possession. In consequence General Brusiloff was bitterly reproached and General Ivanoff was put in command over him."

Nicholas II. ascended the Russian throne in 1894 and had therefore been czar of all the Russian for twenty-three years when his reign and the dynasty of the Romanoffs came to their sudden end.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Blind Dogs and Rats.

Cannines born blind or that become blind by accident are able to smell and paw their way into the most inaccessible and out of the way places. It is practically impossible to starve them, lose them or trap them. Furthermore, blind dogs learn as quickly as those that see. Loss of sight in no way interferes with their ability to learn tricks, acquire habits or find their bed.

Rats, as a matter of fact, if they use their eyes at all—a doubtful matter—can see little or nothing of the world. The retina of these creatures has no point of perfect vision such as is found in the higher animals and man; hence their noses, muscles, touch and hearing give them information about the world they live in.

Rice Culture.

The culture of rice is alluded to in the Talmud, and there is evidence that it was grown in the valley of the Euphrates and in Syria before 400 B. C. It was taken into Persia from India and later into Spain by the Arabs. Thence its culture was introduced into Italy about 1468 A. D. The Spaniards are also responsible for its introduction into Peru and other sections of Spanish America during the early colonial period, but the exact date has not been definitely determined. The first introduction of rice culture in the Americas seems really to have been in Brazil.

His Worst Book.

In "A Last Memory of Robert Louis Stevenson," by Charlotte Eaton, this curious incident is recorded: "What do you consider your brightest failure?" the novelist was asked. "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," he replied without a moment's hesitation, adding, "That is the worst thing I ever wrote." Yet in a standard book of brief biographies this is the one book title given under the name of the author.

Obstreperous

Jim

Story of a Farmer Boy.

By F. A. MITCHELL

There are two things that especially interest me. One is gardening, the other automobiling. In these I have found occupation and amusement after retiring from business, though I am free to confess that since gardening is confined to a portion of the year and one can go motoring at any time I have done more of the latter than the former.

It is in the spring that I have found comfort in my garden. I prepare my ground early, and then when the first warm days come on I start out on a brief tour in my car, for experience has taught me that "one swallow does not make a summer," and I have obtained better results by refraining from planting till later when more reliance is to be placed on the continued warmth of the sun germinating my seed than by putting it in when cold is liable to follow heat.

But there is work in gardening, and motoring is all pleasure. Therefore I confess I prefer the latter.

One morning I stopped at a farmhouse for water for my radiator. The farmer came out, took a bucket, pumped the water and insisted on pouring it into my tank. Before leaving him I indulged him in conversation, for I have noticed that if there is one thing a farmer likes it is to talk.

This is natural. A countryman does not mingle in the busy life of city life. The city man comes home in the evening having had more talk than he has needed and prefers to sit down and be quiet. But the farmer is in a great measure cut off from all interchange of thought with his fellow men. If he can get a city man to swap ideas with him he will talk or listen, as his makeup impels, till the cows come home.

"You seem to have a great variety of produce on your farm," I said to the farmer.

"Yes," he said, "we have. We're near enough to the city for a market, and we put in a lot of different things, so that if some fail we don't make a dead loss."

At that moment a sturdy boy of five came out of the house and stood looking admiringly at my machine.

"Your boy?" I asked the farmer.

"I'm his granddad."

"What would the world be without the children?" I observed.

"You're right, stranger," said the old man. "The only trouble about children is to understand 'em. We don't consider that they're children and not men and women. Consequence is we rub 'em the wrong way. And I've noticed that sometimes the most obstreperous turn out the best. We send 'em to school, and if they learn easy we think they're fine. If they don't we think they're no good."

"I was reading about the big inventor 'tother day—the man they call the wizard, and it said when he was a little feller his teacher took him to his mother and told her the boy was a dunce. The mother took the job of teachin' him herself, but I reckon that boy was born to teach other people, for that's what he's been doin' ever since."

"I never had any trouble with any of my children, except my boy Jim," the father of this little shaver here, the father of Jim was thatwheeler. He got to be thirteen or fourteen years old he knew more'n I and his mother and the whole family. He was ready to tell me how to run the farm, but he couldn't tell me how to run it. He thought he could, and sometimes he did. I told him he'd better keep his opinions to himself."

"Sometimes he'd do things without my knowing it or against my orders. I remember one day I told him to trim an apple tree and be particular to cut off the lower limbs that was hangin' near the ground. What did he do but cut off all the top ones. I didn't give him a lickin' for his disobedience, but I scolded him a lot. Do you know the little cuss' way o' doin' it turned out fine. After that the tree he trimmed give us the biggest and the best apples of any in the orchard. And the best part of it was we didn't have to go up on a long ladder to pick 'em and lose a lot by not bein' able to get 'em."

"Well, Jim was always doin' sompin' the wrong way. When a man is runnin' anything he don't want his assistants to tell him how to do it, especially a boy that he has brought up from a baby. Jim was always monkeyin' in with the farm machinery, throwin' it out o' gear mostly, though once in awhile he'd make it run even. I told him to let it alone and to let everything alone, but it didn't do any good."

"One time I found a quarter acre o' ground that had always produced well ruined. Nothing came up there that season. Come to find out Jim had been puttin' some kind o' chemicals into it. Jim was about sixteen when he did this, and I concluded to get rid of him. I told him he'd better go out for a hired hand, only I warned him that he'd better not tell the men he worked for how to run their farms and do things as he was told to do 'em."

"About this time his grandmother died and left him her savin', about $1,200. Instead o' leavin' it to me, as Jim's guardian, she left it to him to have right off. I think the most incorrigible boys is the favored ones of their mothers, and they certainly are of the gals. Anyway Jim was a favorite of his grandmother, who seemed to think that he knew more than I did. "Jim went away, and I supposed he was goin' to do as I told him—hire out for a farm hand."

"Meantime while he was gone I wasn't gettin' along very well with the farm. I reckoned the land had been worked out and required to be fertilized. I didn't have the money to do the job as it ought to be done, and I thought that if I didn't spend a lot on it I'd lose what I put into it, so I didn't do anything. I tried to raise such crops as didn't need much fertilizer, but didn't get much of a return."

"Jim was away four years, and all the while I was runnin' down financially. He used to write home once in awhile, but he didn't tell us what he was doin'. But Jim was never a good hand at explainin' things. I've thought since that if when he was a boy he'd have told me some'n about what he was doin' at I'd have had more patience with him."

"The only thing Jim did tell us, and he wrote that to his mother the last year he was away, was that he'd got a sweetheart. He said she was the prettiest gal in the world and the best. When his mother told me about it I said I reckoned Jim would have a hard time takin' care of a wife, especially if he was goin' to do things his own way and never take any advice from anybody."

"Well, when I had got so low financially that I had to put a mortgage on my farm Jim came home. He said he'd been to an agricultural college and had come home to help me out. "Father," he said, "you and all the rest of the old fashioned farmers have been blunderin' along for ages. The earth and everything in it is a big laboratory, and there's nothing that isn't subject to the laws of science. Do you remember when you told me to trim the apple tree and cut off the lower branches? Well, it occurred to me that that tree was a mighty big climb for the sap; that by the time it got to the top it must be tired out, and that what apples it produced would be small and few. Besides, it would cost more to gather apples grown as high as that than they'd be worth when you got 'em down."

"And do you remember the ground I put the chemicals in? Well, that was a failure, but when a boy of fourteen begins experimentin' he's not likely to succeed without a lot of failures. Sometimes a grown educated scientist will work for years over a problem and fail in the end."

"When you tired of me and grandmother left me the legacy I determined to use it to learn what there was known about scientific agriculture. I don't claim to have learned any more than is known by others, but I've learned that and it's a good foundation on which to learn more. I'm not going to do much experimentin' on my own hook till I have put you on a better basis in your efforts to make money out of the farm."

"And I must tell you further that there's business in farming as well as anything else. My vacations I've spent clerkin' in a produce store in a big city. There I've learned certain of some middlemen's methods. I've seen something of how he squeezes the consumer on the one hand and the farmer on the other. I don't want to squeeze either myself, but the more a man knows about squeezing the less likely he is to get squeezed."

"Now, dad, I'll tell you what we must do. We must take advantage of our opportunities such as they are and turn away from what are not opportunities, no matter how attractive they look. We've got a market handy for such produce as is used on the tables of any and every body. We'll go into table vegetables on a small scale at first, and if we find it pays we'll increase the scale. As soon as we can work it we'll open a store for the sale of our own produce and make the whole profit ourselves. But we can't go too fast; must feel our way and shift our plans as we run up against stone walls."

The farmer paused in his narrative, cast a glance over his broad beds of garden truck and concluded:

"There's the result of Jim's work. He didn't do any experimentin' till he'd got the business well goin'. I call it the business because business is a part and a very important part of farmin'."

"I've said that Jim didn't do any experimentin', so he didn't in the regular line of the work on the farm, but he's been doin' it all the while in a small way, and he's found out some things already."

"That mortgage I told you of was paid off in two years, and now there's plenty over for all."

"Jim married his sweetheart and they live in the cottage down yonder. This little Jim"—puttin' his hand on the boy's head—"is a chip off the old block; he has a will of his own, anyway. There's his dad now."

A sturdy young man of twenty-five or six in overalls came up to us and was introduced by his father. I had some talk with him about his profession, but found him very reticent and could get only a little out of him. Evidently he was a man of deeds instead of words."

I was so pleased with this bit of life's success that I motored that way again and met Jim's mother and his wife. There was an air of prosperity and comfort about all these people and their farm that was very attractive to me, and in time I came to know them all well. During these visits Jim received a high appointment in the United States department of agriculture."

If there is any moral to this story it seems to me it is that a genius is so far out of the beaten track that he is apt to be considered a dunce. In other words, his brain is so absorbed with the generally unknown that it is impossible to fix it on the known."

ASHAMED OF THE PIMPLES

PIMPLES and skin eruptions always seem to come where they are the most noticeable, and consequently most embarrassing to the person so unfortunate as to have them.

The most satisfactory treatment for pimples and skin eruptions is Dr. Chase's Ointment, applied at night after bathing the skin in warm water. Instead of clogging the pores, as do powders, Dr. Chase's Ointment cleanses them and promotes the healthy action of the pores of the skin.

By its antiseptic action this ointment destroys poisonous germs, and thereby prevents the development of eczema. There are scores of ways in which Dr. Chase's Ointment is useful in every home.

PIMPLES AND BLACKHEADS.

Miss Carrie Alwater, Bitters Lake, Alta., writes: "I was entirely cured of pimples and blackheads some months ago by using Dr. Chase's Ointment. As I have also found this ointment a splendid treatment for sunburn and chapped hands, I would not be without it in the house. It is the best I ever used."

How Military Bill Works

The Military Service Bill became law upon receiving the assent of the Senate, but the only provisions which will immediately affect the public are those which provide penalties for discharging the public from compliance with the new Act.

Before any class is called out the tribunals necessary to the Act's operation must be appointed and regulations issued to cover the many points left to be so covered. When this has been done the public will receive information that the first class, or some part of it, is called to the colors. The class in question embraces single male British subjects between 20 and 34; that is, those who have attained the age of 20 years and were born not earlier than 1881. Widowers without children are considered single. The Government has intimated that subjects of alien enemy birth will not be required to serve.

Posters will be put up in every part of Canada notifying the public of the precise class called out. The administrators of the bill have power to divide the first, or any class, into subclasses, but it is doubtful if this will be done with the first class, as the idea of Parliament was that the first draft should combine the steadiness of men in their thirties with the dash of men in their twenties. It is hoped to get the whole 100,000, to which the bill is limited, from the one class, so that no married men are likely to be called out.

The proclamations calling out the class will name two dates: one, the earlier, at which those wishing to apply for exemption must do so before a local tribunal and the other or later date at which all who have not been exempted or to whom exemption has been refused must report to the military authorities for service. Those whose cases are not yet dealt with or are in appeal do not have to report until there is a final judgment. A man may apply to any local tribunal in his Province for exemption, but the one hand, the military authorities will have their own doctors to examine every man who reports.

Men of the various militia units in Canada not enlisted for overseas will be treated just like any other citizens. Returned soldiers, men from the navy or members of the Imperial forces will, of course, be exempt.

The foregoing is a brief resume of the Act's operations, but the present necessity is for the Cabinet to appoint a Supreme Court Judge as Central Appeal Judge and for Parliament to appoint members of the Commons and Senate on a committee to choose one member of each local tribunal, the other member to be chosen in each case by the County Court Judge of the district. The making of these appointments, with the issuing of a mass of regulations, will occupy the Government and the advisory committee for some time.

Hints To Housewives

(By Mrs. Jean Muldrew, Director Domestic Economy, Food Controller's Office).

Save white bread. Don't use Beef or Bacon on Tuesdays or Fridays, and do not serve it at more than one meal on any other day.

Preach the gospel of the clean plate. Use perishable foods and conserve staple foods.

Serve smaller helpings. It is better to serve a small helping than to have some left on the plate.

Plan long and wisely how to feed the family. Just now it is the finest service you can give to the Empire and to the world.

Cook, season and serve your vegetables so that the family will want more vegetables.

The larger the vegetable bill, the smaller will be the doctor's bill.

Guard well against loss of food through flies, ants or mice. Any loss of food helps the enemy.

Sign the Food Service Pledge.

A Great Bargain

The war map issued by The Family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal is now ready for distribution. It is certainly a great map and a great help in following war news. It is greatly praised by returned officers and men. The price of The Family Herald is now $1.25 a year, a smaller increase than was expected. The map given with each subscription is cheaper than ever. The map alone would cost as much. The paper and map are given to both new and renewal subscriptions at $1.25 a year but the map cannot be secured otherwise. The Family Herald is the greatest family and farm paper on the continent and a great credit to Canada.

Soldiers' Letters

thinks which I tender in the name of the County men.

W. M. LAUGHLIN.

The two following letters were received by Miss Thompson, Secretary of Queensboro Patriotic League:

France, July 22nd.

DEAR MISS THOMPSON,—
Your welcome parcel received the other day and very many thanks for same. I wrote you some time ago but do not know if you ever received that letter. Things are much the same on this side of the U.S.A. doing something big in the war, and no doubt, with her coming in it will bring the end much nearer. Please excuse this short note. You will no doubt be pleased to hear that I have been awarded the D.C.M. Trusting you are in the best of health.

PTE. E. WALKER.

London, Eng., August 9th.

DEAR MISS THOMPSON,—
It was with great pleasure that I received to-day the pair of socks so kindly sent me by the Women's Patriotic League in Mrs. Moore's parcel. I assure you they came at a very opportune moment, having just returned from a 4-days' sham battle and all clean socks being exhausted, so they were immediately transferred from box to feet of recipient. Kindly convey my thanks to the League when you next meet. I congratulate the women of Queensboro and yourself as one of the most energetic workers on the great success they have met with and the great good their efforts are accomplishing. Its worth while to have a part to play in this great struggle for righteousness. Every calling in life is represented here in Witley Camp of 20,000 or more soldiers. So it seems appropriate to me that the pulpit should be represented in the ranks and make common cause against the universal enemy. Remember me in your devotion that I may be spared to return for the sake of my dear family.

WALTER SMART.

The following letter was received by Mrs. Knox from her son, an old Madoc boy:

France, August 1st.

MY DEAR MOTHER,—
I am going to take time to write you a letter supposing the Kaiser calls for me in the meantime. I received your cake and it was sure great. You don't know how much a fellow can think of those days before he left home while he is eating a piece of cake. I have no doubt, mother, that you are continually worrying about me and really there is no cause to worry for I did not come over here to be home again in a few months for I do not see how this war can last much longer.

I never see anybody from around Madoc that I know but then I do not suppose I would know them now for, take for instance, Charlie Watson, was only a small kid when I left the East. How long since I was home? I know it is longer than it should have been.

If King George or somebody in authority in this corner of France would only give me permission I could write you a very interesting letter but as it is I will have to wait until I come home. I guess I will get a pass to Paris for 10 days, perhaps this week. I would sooner go to Paris than to England for I was over there sightseeing for about 9 months. This touring of the Old Country and the Continent has its drawbacks, just a month since I lit a cigarette, I think that cigarette smoking is, according to the old Madoc standard, about the worst habit I have acquired since I left home. I am feeling fine and am able to take all the nourishment they give me. I must ring off and go to bed. I believe it would be safe to run up against a German tank and tell me I had to sleep in a real bed. Of course none of those Germans have done me any real personal injury but can those Germans who have been favored by that meeting say the same about Canadians.

PTE. TOM KNOX.

The following letter was received by Mr. John Canniff, Cooper, and referred to his brother who was reported killed:

In the Field, August 8th.

DEAR SIR,—
Your letter re your brother just to hand. Unfortunately we have heard nothing else of your brother. He was missing after a little mix-up on May 9th and we have been able to get no more news, either official or unofficial. One man who was with his section has since been reported prisoner in Germany. If I hear anything further I will let you know immediately.

September Rod and Gun is out and shows the usual list of good things for sportsmen readers and lovers of the out of doors. The issue is a good one to put in the late summer vacationist's knapsack. Such stories as "The Hide Builders," Bonnycastle Dale; "Two Weeks without a care," T. N. Hewitt; "Duck Hunting on the Small Sloughs," George Bellon; "A Cruise in the Skop," Katharine, "A Day in the Woods," The Time, The Place, "The Game," Archie McKishnie; and "Fishing in Little Streams," Reginald Gourlay, make the vacationist glad he can't go and the stay-at-home man sorry he can't go into the north woods when the hunting season comes on. Among the special departments, that devoted to dog men's interests, The Kennel, contains this month a full report of the recent Regina dog show. Rod and Gun is published by W. J. THE FOOD PROBLEM.

One Way to Meet It is Through Simple Habits and Meatless Days.

Dr. Harvey W. Wiley told the Economic Club of New York that if he could get the laboring men to listen to him by telling them what to eat, he could elicit his own boys, two and four years of age, as "more cheaply fed and better fed than any other boys in the United States." Whole wheat and milk are the principal features of their diet.

The twenty-five cent a day diet demonstration with thirteen New York policemen was an unqualified success. Nearly all gained in weight, and all enjoyed their meals during the entire three weeks. This is not an altogether remarkable achievement, for many a workman's family of six members is compelled to spend less than $1.50 a day on the table. The chief value of the demonstration was the well balanced diet that was provided, a feature that does not usually characterize the meals of those who are compelled to live cheaply.

What we need to offset the high prices are education in the fundamentals of nutrition and a revival of the simple habits that prevailed a generation or two ago. We are the biggest meat eating nation in the world. If the meat supply continues to decrease while the population increases we shall have to change our habits. Government reports show a decline of 10,000,000 in the number of cattle other than milk cows and of 5,000,000 in the number of sheep in the last ten years, while the population increased 15,000,000. The American family should inaugurate meatless days.

HISTORIC BAGDAD.

In Ancient Times It Was the Finest City in the World.

Bagdad is known in ancient history as the capital of the mighty Saracen empire, over which the descendants of King Nebuchadnezzar ruled for many centuries. The population of Bagdad is uncertain, but the best authorities estimate it at about 150,000.

The bulk of the people are of Arab blood, but there are thousands of Jews and a large admixture of other races, especially Persians. The Turks are comparatively few and are mostly government officials.

The entire city is surrounded by a brick wall five miles in circumference and forty feet high, but in some places broken down, and by a deep, dark ditch.

The houses of Bagdad have, in general, no windows toward the front and are built of old yellowish red brick which has been known to become red hot during the heat of the day. The interiors of the houses are gorgeously decorated with vaulted ceilings, rich moldings, inlaid mirrors and massive gildings.

The domes and minarets, of which there are no fewer than 2,000, the earliest dating from the twelfth century, are ornamented with glazed tiles and paintings in green and white and are considered to be the finest in the world.

When Bagdad was the home of the caliphate in the eighth century it was the finest city in the world, possessing a population of over 2,000,000.

Transvaal Terminations.

In perusing the names of South African towns in the newspapers many must have noted the word "fontein," which appears so often. This word in the English "fontain," and towns with this termination have been named after Dutch farms, which are always built beside fountains of spring water.

Thus Bloemfontein means "flowery fountain," Middelfontein "muddy fountain," Kleinfontein "small fountain" and Elandsfontein "deer fountain."

Another town termination which many readers must have noticed is that of "laagte," which is pronounced "laughty." It means "shelter for animals," and hence when we talk of the battle of Elandslaagte we may know that it was fought on a spot frequented by deer.—London Mail.

Not Always.

"And now, boys," concluded the eminent visitor to the school, "never be in next visitor to the school, never be in too great a hurry. More haste, less speed. Remember the boys and the motto. Let 'slow, but sure,' be your motto. Then you will be sure."

"Not always, sir," piped a young urchin.

"Not always? How do you make that out?"

"There's lots of things that's slow, but they ain't sure."

"Oh! Name one, then."

"Please, sir, a watch."—Exchange.

Food Value of Milk.

Milk is an animal food. In nature its use is universal as food for the growing young. This means that milk makes growth, does more than merely maintain the body. Milk possesses the element of growth not only in the butter fat, but also in the skim milk. There is no better food than milk.—Exchange.

Ink Stains.

If ink is split on the tablecloth immediately melt a candle. Taking some of the tallow, spread it over the ink patch and leave it to dry. Afterward wash the tablecloth, and all traces of ink will disappear.

Belligerent.

The word belligerent is formed of two Latin words—bellum (war) and gerere (carry). A belligerent nation is one that is carrying on war.

One way to keep a body from becoming a busybody is to keep a body busy.—Youth's Companion.

Tripled Her Baking Capacity.

"One day, when baking cookies," says a housewife in the Woman's Home Companion, "I expressed a wish for larger pans. My husband said, 'Why not have some made to fit the oven?' He then measured the grate and went down to the hardware store. In a few days I had two Russia iron pans 19 1/2 by 13 1/2 inches and one inch deep. As these pans hold three dozens of cookies I can do my baking very much more quickly than I could with the old pans, which only held twelve cookies."

A Reminiscence of the Past.

During the campaign in the Peninsula there was in the Torres Vedras affair a strip of vineyard running between the two lines, which was upon as a sort of neutral ground, only, in contrast to what happens nowadays in "no man's land," writes the Paris correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, the men from both armies were in the habit of repairing there for drinks and relaxation, in often came across one another, but each passed their own way after courteous salutes. One day a British party had drunk somewhat freely, and, happening upon a French sergeant of the Guard, insisted upon making him a prisoner. The man had the good fortune to come before the Duke of Wellington in person, and lost no time in acquainting him with his plight.

"All right," said the Duke good-naturedly, "of course you shall go, but you must have something to eat first," and, turning to an orderly, he said: "Have this man taken to the kitchen and given a good meal." The Frenchman saluted, but made no attempt to express his thanks. Noticing his looks, the Duke said: "Well, what more do you want?" "General," replied the Frenchman, drawing himself up proudly, "a soldier of the Guard is never asked to eat in the kitchen!"

The Duke bent his brow a moment, as if resenting the man's audacity; then, laughing, said—

"Maybe you're right. Come and dine with me!"

Events of The War in Brief

Heavy concentration of Austrian troops is being prepared against the Italians on the Isonzo front. The Austrian command is prepared to make almost any sacrifice to recover what is known as the K. line.

On the Western front there are indications that the Allies are preparing for a new offensive.

On the Macedonian front the French and Italian forces have made some gains in Albania.

Russia is now divided into two hostile camps. Premier Kerensky is the head of the forces of democracy and Korniloff, Commander-in-Chief of the Russian forces, head of the forces of Militarism. Korniloff is advancing on Petrograd. By orders of Kerensky the tracks of all rail roads leading in to the capital are being torn up what the outcome of present conditions may be is impossible to say.

Refusal to Revert Means Conscription

An official of Militia Department states that in the event of a senior officer refusing to accept the lower rank and returning to Canada, he would be liable to service under the Military Service Act. Any man, no matter whether he had gone overseas or not, if he had not actually seen service at the front and been discharged, would be liable under the Act.

Widows for Canada

Thousands of British war widows and their children are to be transported to Canada, with the expectation that many of the women will be married to Canadian farmers. The movement is to be carried out according to the plans of Commissioner David Lamb of the International Emigration Society of the Salvation Army. [There has been much publicity in Canada as regards scarcity, but as regards scarcity of prospective husbands for Canadian farmers this is our first intimation from the Government of an intention to form an Imperial Matrimonial Bureau to improve the rural population statistics and incidentally to furnish lucrative and dignified positions for Canadian officers who have won honor in England fighting the Hun in France.—Ed.]

of the Firemen.—C'd.

BY LORD NORTHCLIFFE

Among the consequences of the war none has been more surprising, none more fraught with happy augury, than the visit paid lately by a detachment of Canadian Highlanders to the United States; and the warmth of the welcome they met with.

That British troops in uniform should march through American cities should be cheered in New York, should arouse a city like Newark, New Jersey, to enthusiasm, should march up Bunker Hill without calling forth a word of Jingo protest—that is one of the most astonishing things of our time. When I rose a few weeks ago to address the vast recruiting rally in Madison Square Garden, New York, the joint recruiting rally of the British and American organizations, I felt the significance of the occasion sweep over me. I said to the fourteen thousand people present: "This is a historic meeting. It is such an auspicious one as could never have occurred before."

It was not sentiment which had made it possible. Talk of closer relations might have gone on for centuries without producing this effect. This meeting at which British and American speakers appeared on the same platform and made a joint appeal for men to fight the common enemy for a common end, was made possible by only facts. Words could not have done it. It was the common danger and the need for United effort to repel it which brought the two great English-speaking nations of the world nearer together than they have ever been before.

I do not greatly believe in sentiment as a factor of importance in international friendships. Alliances are formed for mutual protection. The French Republic would not have allied herself with the Russian autocracy if the ever present threat of German aggression had not forced her to seek a friend where she could. It is well known that the Austrians, if dislike the Germans and despise them for their boorish manners and lack of taste. Austria has not forgotten the defeat inflicted upon her by Prussia in 1866. Nothing but force of circumstances would have caused Austria to ally herself with Prussia. If national sentiment were the determining factor in the formation of alliances, how could we explain Bulgaria's choice to fight in this war alongside of Turkey with whom she was at death-grips five years ago, and against the Serbians who were then her "dear and trusted allies."

The United States and the five free nations which constitute the British Empire have come together in so unexpected a manner for mutual protection. The United States came into the war, their leading men have assured us, not because of their traditional sympathy for France, not because Belgium lay under the hoof of the Hun, but to spread Democracy in Europe, but to safeguard American interests. Senator Borah was generally admitted to express the prevailing opinion among thinking Americans when he declared in the United States Senate on July 23:

"I did not vote for war out of sympathy with France, much as I admire her, but because our American rights were trampled on and our people murdered, and the prospect of continued outrages and national degradation. I voted for war to make safe our own blessed republic and give dignity, honor and security to this democracy throughout Europe, although I would be glad to see every King and Prince exiled and every dynasty broken forever. This has become an American war, a fight for American principles, to be discontinued when American interests are safeguarded and satisfied. It is no longer a war to spread democracy in Europe or for rehabilitation of European countries. It is a war showing that the United States, though slow to act, is swift to avenge."

It is not long since the idea of any alliance between the British Empire and the United States was considered a dream, and a dangerous dream. In both the balance of feeling was against any step in this direction. Now, because a common danger threatens both they are allied, and no voice is raised in protest. The English-speaking races in the New World and the Old are united for the first time in history. It is not sentiment which unites them, though I am sure they feel more kindness and respect towards one another now than they have done in the past. They are joined together by the cement of necessity. Each needs the other in the struggle against the antiquated but still powerful Absolutist idea which menaces the freedom of all who do not, like Turkey and Bulgaria, bow down and cravenly obey it.

It is not surprising that many people should be asking whether the union of the English-speaking races ought not to be continued after this war has come to an end. We have a good deal of discussion about the possibility of British-American Federation. I have recently been asked what my views are about this.

Already I think I have written enough to show those who can read a little between the lines now my thoughts run. Such a Federation as a permanent union, in my opinion, only be created and kept in existence if the British Empire and the United States feel that it is necessary for their security against some strong hostile combination such as that which we are fighting today.

Letters from Our Soldiers

The following letter was received by Mrs. John Baalim from her nephew Pte. Clarence Embury:

France, July 16th, 1917.

DEAR AUNT AND COUSIN,—

I received a parcel and a letter, the parcel was supposed to be from Aunt, but I have a hunch that Cousin P. had a hand in it; at any rate, it was very thankful to one and all for same as it arrived in good condition. The only thing wrong was that the honey spilled over the candies and made the sweets a little sweeter. Each and everything was a real treat, especially the cake and shelled butternuts. As we are barred writing about military matters or as to our locality these few lines may be disappointing as a letter. We are getting nice warm summer weather here at present with perhaps a little too much rain, but it is ideal growing weather and the crops are extra numerous so perhaps they make up for the lack of sun. This is an old settled farming community but their methods of farming are very crude and away behind the times compared with the Canadian ways. I saw a farmer sowing oats. He had one horse hitched to a double mould board plow; his wife followed him up and scattered the oats along the furrow and after the patch was done they covered the same by harrowing. Another fellow had a little more modern implement; it was a 1-horse shoe drill of 3 drills with 2 plow handles on the rear to guide it straight. They have their horses well trained for they drive them with a bit of a cord that one would hardly lead a dog with. To see a Frenchman driving a 2-horse team is a rare sight. They are mostly big horses. If I am spared to return will be able to tell you more than I could or can write down on paper.

PTE. CLARENCE EMBURY.

In the Field, July 28th.

DEAR MRS. LEMMON,—

I am very sorry to inform you that nothing more has been heard of your husband. The last that was seen of him was with two others. They were in a hot corner and up against 10 or 12 Huns. They are believed killed and you can rest assured that your husband died like a real soldier. If he had been taken prisoner we would have heard certainly before this. He was exceptionally well liked by all his comrades and it is with great regret that I must send you this information. Anything further that I can do you have only to ask.

O.C.D. Com., 21st Can. Batt.

P.S.—Of course as his body was never found, we having to retire from this little spot we have none of his personal effects. After three months' missing a man's military estate is wound up. I would suggest that you write the Militia Department at Ottawa, Y. I. D.

P.S.2—Have just received word that one of our Corporals who was one of the two men with your husband is a prisoner in Germany and well. Nothing was heard of your husband.—Y.I.D.

This is all I know of Pte. Murnie Lemmon.

The following letter was received by Dr. Pine from his son and describes one day's French leave in England: Warrington, Aug. 16.

DEAR FATHER,—

I was up to London yesterday, the first day's experience in that city, so I will try and explain my day's adventure to you. I took French leave. I got one of the patients of the hospital who knew London well and understood the routine to take to make best time to tell me how to see the most historical points of interest. We arose in the morning at 5.30, got dressed and made through the wires, scouted the fields, hedges, roads and golf links until we were out of sight of the hospital. We had 14 hours to roam before we took a tram bus for London. This was done partly in the shade of hazelnut trees from which we partook of the fruit while one of those English sprinklers came up and passed over. I made our traveling gear. At last we came to the academy road from Warrington to Crofton. While walking the first half mile of this road we ate our lunch which consisted of bread and margarine. Then we called in a keeper's hut and sat with him while another slight shower passed over, then continued our journey 2 miles further, dodging behind hedges while autos passed with officers in them and also military police. Then we arrived at the Sugar Loaf in Crofton where we got a tram bus for Westminster bridge. These tram cars are much the same shape as our street cars with seats on an upper deck, a winding stair in the rear and had lady conductors. Before reaching the tram we scooped Kenley, Sutton, Addington, Sandstead, Peckham, then Sugar Loaf. On taking the tram we passed the conductress 5 paces each; car moving on we went through Groyden, Thorntonbeath, Norbury.

Miner's Luck

Story of a Girl's Bravery

By ELINOR MARSH

Pete Clarkson was working on a claim when he saw something glimmer in the sunlight. Stopping, he picked up a small chunk of ore and held it near to his eyes.

Clarkson threw aside his pick. He posted his notice of possession by laying the paper on the newly broken ground and placing a stone on top to keep it from blowing away. Any one who jumped that claim now might expect the wild justice of the mining camp to be visited upon him.

As he drew near the camp the thunder of the stamp mills smote the air, and the blur of smoking chimneys dimmed the eastern sky.

Pete Clarkson's persistent efforts and dogged determination to find something that would enrich him sufficiently to offer Molly Gray a home had resulted in his striking what was probably the lost vein of the Great Dome ledge.

He stopped once at the house of Jim Gray, superintendent of the Great Dome, and Molly Gray, sweet as a rose, with gray eyes, brown hair, pink cheeks and pink gown, came to the door.

"How'd you make out, Pete?" she asked, her little brown hand lost in his great earth stained palm.

"It's the Molly Gray," he said quietly, thrusting the lump of ore into her other hand.

"Oh, Pete," she cried joyfully. "Where we saw the sunset that night?"

"On Crow ledge, near Crow rock."

"Where we saw the sunset that night?"

"Same place."

"What were you doing there, Pete?" she asked, with dimpling cheeks.

"Prospecting," he grinned sheepishly. Then, passing his hand over his unshorn chin, he nodded toward the Great Dome smelter. "I guess it will be all right now down there," he said confidently.

"You know it has always been all right with me, Pete," said Molly softly.

"I know," he said soberly. "I'm going down now to get out my papers. I'll stop on my way back."

"Haven't you registered yet?" she asked anxiously.

"Nope; stopped here first thing. Got her staked all right, though, and the name posted. Got back there to make camp. So long; see you later."

And with a backward wave of his hand he hopped down toward the registering office.

From the doorway of the cabin at the head of the street Molly, holding a pair of fieldglasses to her pretty eyes, watched him enter the office.

Then her gaze fell upon the figure of a man sprawled upon the rough veranda encircling the one roomed building. A wide brimmed hat was drawn over his eyes, and to all appearances he was lost in slumber.

Molly looked at the open window over the man's head and calculated that if Pete Clarkson announced his discovery in his usual bluff, hearty accents it could readily be heard by the man on the veranda if he were awake and listening, and if it should prove to be Dave Lumly, who was own brother to Jim Lumly, the registrar of claims, why, then, Pete Clarkson would have a race for his claim, that was all. She remembered the case of Allan Smith, the young prospector from the east who made a find and staked his claim. Before he could register it and return to the scene Dave Lumly had news of the find and had jumped the claim. With his brother to back his title to it, Lumly had defied the sheriff and his posse to oust him. Young Smith had shot himself, and, after all, the mine had proved worthless.

Ah, the moment one arose slowly, stretched himself, took a careful survey of the street; then, with a swift movement, leaped into the middle of a waiting sorrel and rode out Black lane. It was Dave Lumly.

Presently she saw Pete emerge from the registry office and cross the street to the assayers. With sudden energy she re-entered the house, scribbled a few lines informing Pete of her whereabouts in case she could not find him, pinned the note to the front door, and died her little mare Daisy, mounted and dashed down the street toward the assayer's office.

"If he comes back tell him to go up to our place. There's a message for him. Will you tell him?" she inquired breathlessly.

"Sure thing, Miss Molly," he said heartily; then, he watched her disappear down the long street and out upon the short cut through the canyon to Crow mountain. The afternoon sun shone on her hatless head and the light wind fluttered her pink skirts as the little mare broke into a gallop.

Once she drew rein and took a swift survey of the country.

Mile after mile the mare covered, scrambling up steep hillsides and sliding recklessly down the slopes. Molly, with blazing eyes and compressed lips, watched for the reappearance of the sorrel horse and its slouching rider. Lumly, taking advantage of the information he had gleaned at the registry office, would remove Pete's stake, substitute one of his own and claim possession of the Molly Gray. If she could only reach Crow rock before Dave Lumly she would fight with all the fierceness of old Jim Gray himself for the possession of her lover's rights.

Molly frowned, and every now and then she turned and looked back along the trail for some sign of the approach of Pete Clarkson. If he returned to the cabin, as he had intended doing, he would find her note.

With heart beating in time to the muffled thud of Daisy's hoofs, she drew rein on the crest of the ledge and looked about for Dave Lumly, but he was not in sight, and with resumed confidence she cantered along the narrow, uneven trail to Crow rock.

When she rounded the rock the sorrel was nipping the parched turf and Lumly, on his knees, was stuffing a piece of white paper into his pocket. His back was toward her, and he had doubtless mistaken the tread of her horse for the trampling of his own beast.

"Look here, Dave Lumly!" Lumly jumped to his feet and looked into the barrel of a revolver leveled with cool precision.

"You git outter my way, young lady," he sneered defiantly, making a movement to grasp her bridle rein.

"Stop there or I'll fire!" she said calmly.

"What do you want?" he growled, looking at her out of stealthy red eyes.

"I want you to put that paper back in the hole," she commanded sharply.

"And if I don't?" he grinned savagely.

"Why, if you don't," she said, with a calculating glance, "I believe I'll just bore your right arm."

"The devil you will! It seems to me you are pretty highly tighty, mlas."

"Are you going to do it?" she asked.

"Oh, sure; of course I couldn't refuse a lady," he said, taking the paper from his pocket with his right hand and furtively reaching with his left around to his hip.

"Your left hand up!" she commanded again.

With a muttered oath he swung his arm aloft. The sorrel horse drew near and thrust an inquiring nose toward his master. With a quick movement Lumly held out the paper, the sorrel caught it between his lips, and in another instant it fell to the ground a mass of pulp. Lumly laughed exultantly.

Molly Gray whitened about the lips.

"Other hand up!" she commanded shortly.

The man obeyed.

"Turn your back and walk toward me," he said, as he hesitated, she added contemptuously, "Don't be afraid. I'm not going to shoot you in the back."

He turned sullenly and backed slowly up to the mare's side. With muzzle pressed close to his shock of rough hair she abstracted the six shooter from his belt and ascertained that there was no other weapon. The man trembled slightly. It was a pesky feeling with a revolver. One never knew what—

"Now walk forward twenty steps and don't turn; if you do it will be for the last time!" Molly did not recognize her own sweet voice in the firm tones that cut the air like the lash of a whip.

The man obeyed. When, at her word of command, he faced about, the feet of the little mare were gathered in the hole in the ground, and her rider, with shining eyes and bright, glad smile, looked at him down the length of his own six shooter.

"In fifteen minutes at the latest Pete Clarkson, Mill Hodges and the sheriff will strike this ledge. I advise you, Dave Lumly, if you value your life, to prospect around Cartertown way for a few years. The trail is plain; there's your horse, and I'm giving you a chance."

Lumly looked back down the trail. Several horsemen were riding rapidly up Crow creek bottom. There was a flash of sunlight on metal.

With a muttered curse he turned toward his horse. "You'll pay for this holdup, girl," he said threateningly.

"It's not a holdup; it's a hold down," retorted Molly saucily.

As Lumly disappeared among the distant western slopes three men rode madly down the trail and rounded Crow rock in a cloud of dust and a scatter of flying stones. Molly Gray, with trembling lips, smiled upon them.

"Where is he?" demanded Pete, while the other men looked mingled disappointment and admiration upon pretty Molly.

She pointed toward the west, where a solitary horseman was silhouetted against the amber sunset sky ere it dropped behind a distant hill.

"So you let the critter go!" uttered the sheriff ruefully.

Pete looked at her questioningly.

"I didn't want bloodshed on Crow rock, Pete," she explained in a low tone.

A light of understanding came into his eyes. He nodded his head. "That's all right, sheriff. I guess that coyote won't jump any more claims hereabouts, I reckon."

"Where is your claim, Pete?" asked Hodges, looking curiously around.

"Here it is," interpolated Molly, blushing. "He was jumping it when—"

"And you stood him off?" chorused the men.

She nodded gravely. "He fed the paper to the horse, so I held him up, and now I'm holding down the claim myself."

"I don't understand," said Hodges blindly.

"Why, you see," faltered Molly, while Pete glanced furtively upon her. "I'm the claim—that is, I'm Molly Gray, and I'm holding down the claim. It's the Molly Gray, you know," she said, slipping down from the saddle into the outstretched arms of her lover.

THE OWL FAMILY.

Not All of These Birds Are Nocturnal.

Most of our owls are rather common, but being generally nocturnal and wary and inhabiting by preference those districts far from human habitations, they are more rarely observed. With keen attention to all of the detail of plumage, form, flight, etc., one may pretty nearly be sure of all of the following species:

The screech owl is the size of a pigeon, but stouter; head with ear tufts, tail with dark cross bands; flies only at night; common everywhere; familiar call.

The Arcadian or saw-whet owl is smaller than a pigeon; head with no ear tufts; tail with white cross bars; rather common in the Middle West; cry like name.

The pygmy owl is no larger than a robin; but more fluffy; no tufts on head; tail with white spots; common in the Rocky Mountains and to the Pacific Coast; flies in daytime.

The burrowing owl is about the body size of a pigeon; no ear tufts on head; digs holes; lives in prairie-dog towns; flies in daytime; white bars on tail.

The long-eared owl is a little smaller than a crow, or shorter; head with long ear tufts; tail closely barred with rufous and brown; not often seen, but common.

The short-eared owl is the size of the last, ear tufts inconspicuous; tail with few dark bands, everywhere common, but generally roosts all day.

The hawk owl is a little smaller than a crow, tail long with many dark crossbars; hawklike; flies mostly in daytime; Southern Canada only in winter.

The barred owl is as large as a crow and stouter; plumage black with cross bands of dull white; flies rarely in daytime; cry of who who!

The barn owl is about as large as a crow; long legs, not feathered to toes; plumage tawney reddish, marked with brown and white; common; flies in daytime and hunts mice on ground; useful.

The snowy owl, seen only in winter, is much larger and stouter than a crow; plumage white, marked with dark spots.

The great-horned owl is larger than a crow, with large ear tufts; color drab, mottled with black, brown and white; barred thickly on the breast; flies day and night; savage; call a steamboat whistle; common everywhere, but wary; soars high in the air.

The great gray or eagle owl is the giant of its race, having no ear tufts; found in the Arctic and in Southern Canada only in winter.

The Bantam Regiment.

Unique among the armies of Europe, the British "Bantams" have amply justified the opinion which the late Lord Kitchener formed of them.

They owe their existence to his initiative and foresight. Many men had been rejected because of their shortness of stature, and Lord Kitchener's idea was that if the little men wanted to fight for their country the right should not be denied them.

A correspondent at the British headquarters in the field says:

"No man over five feet three inches was accepted. Short men who had been turned away in the early days of the New Army formed the first battalion. As it was a success, others followed. At the front they were brigaded together, and a visitor to certain parts of the line sees thousands of sturdy short-legged men marching along the roads and keeping guard in the trenches."

Many jokes have been made about them. It was even suggested that when they went into the trenches some one would have to hold them up to the parapet to fire. Instead of having to hold them up, however, the difficulty is to keep them from showing their heads. They have the advantage of being small targets, and they are completely sheltered in a trench where another man's head would be exposed.

"They are particularly good at scouting," said one of their officers.

Running Comments.

A young officer, somewhat affected in style, was explaining to his men what happened to a shell after leaving the gun. The comedian of the company could not refrain from making remarks sotto voce, much to the amusement of his men.

"This was part of the reason, Officer: 'The shell, on leaving the gun, owing to the bore, goes round and round.'"

Voice: "The mulberry bush." Officer: "After its momentum is expended gravity draws it to earth, or else it would keep on for ever and ever." Voice: "Amen!"

Barbers' Itch and Eczema.

Barbers' Itch is in reality a form of eczema. The delicate skin becomes irritated from shaving, a little infection gets in, and soon burning, stinging eczema is set up.

Fortunately, there is cure for Barbers' Itch and Eczema in the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment, and once you have made the acquaintance of this soothing, healing ointment, you will always keep it on hand to apply after shaving.

Not every time, but whenever there is roughness or irritation of the skin.

Mr. Chase, A. Durbury, Westford, Ont., states:—"While on the job, I caught barbers' itch, and anyone who has had it will admit that it is not at all pleasant. It began on my neck below the chin, and spread until I became alarmed. It itched so bad that I had to scratch it, and that only made it worse."

"A friend of mine told me to use Dr. Chase's Ointment, and I did so. The application of this ointment gave prompt relief to the itching, and it was the very words said I was cured of this annoying ailment."

Some of the ingredients of Dr. Chase's Ointment are very expensive, and for this reason imitations and substitutes are offered because they afford greater profits to the dealer. They will only disappoint you. The genuine Dr. A. W. Chase's Ointment will positively cure.

THE CHIEF CHARM OF LOVELY WOMAN

Soft, Clear, Smooth Skin Comes With The Use Of "FRUIT-A-LIVES".

NORAH WATSON
86 Drayton Ave., Toronto.
Nov. 10th, 1913.

A beautiful complexion is a handsome woman's chief glory and the envy of her less fortunate rivals. Yet a soft, clear skin—glowing with health—is only the natural result of pure blood.

"I was troubled for a considerable time with a very unpleasant, disfiguring rash, which covered my face and for which I used applications and remedies without relief. After using 'Fruit-a-lives' for one week, the rash is completely gone. I am deeply thankful for the relief and in the future, I will not be without 'Fruit-a-lives'."

There is no limit to their nerve. It is nothing for them to crawl out in the dark across No Man's Land up to the German barbed wire. In one of the recent trench raids they captured a machine gun. No battalions have so thoroughly the good wishes of the entire army.

Following this idea of Lord Kitchener's, the Canadians also organized Bantam Battalions, which are now arriving at the front. The 21st Battalion, which was drawn from the Toronto division, recently reached England and was accorded a hearty reception.

Trench Signs.

"Wit is often shown in the notice boards which our soldiers set up in the trenches. Thus a frequently shelled trench junction bears the legend, 'Don't stand about here—there's a war on.' A Canadian war correspondent has collected a number of these, one of the best being a spot which had once been used by the Germans as a dump for stores, now labeled, 'Fritz's Dump—Under Entirely New Management.'"

A siege battery had the whole side of its drive gun team into the hole where the door had been. On a bit of remaining wall are the words, 'Don't Stand Out There Knocking—Come Right In!'

The Miracle Man

FRANK L. PACKARD

Copyright, 1916,
By Frank L. Packard.

Why not go to the cottage now, as once, and talk it over?

"Can we see him?" asked Mrs. Thornton wistfully. "Oh, I would like to kneel at his feet and pour out my gratitude! But see how all these people go so nearer than that row of trees, as though love or fear or reverence kept them from going farther."

"True," said Madison, "and I sense that very thing myself. All men must sense it after what has taken place. All must feel the presence of a power too majestic, too full of awe, for the mind to grasp. This faith—he threw out his hands in an impotent gesture—"we can only accept it unquestioningly as a mighty thing, an actual, living, existent thing, even if we cannot fully understand. But I feel that with what we have in mind we have a right to go there now, and we should take that little lad who was cured as well, and his parents they should come too."

"And shall we see him?" Mrs. Thornton asked again tensely.

"Why, I do not know," Madison replied, "but at least we shall see his niece, Miss Vail; and it is with her, in any case, that we would have to discuss the plan, for the Patriarch, you know, is deaf and dumb and blind."

"You know them, don't you?" Thornton inquired.

Madison smiled a little strangely, a little deprecatingly.

"If one can speak of 'knowing' such as they—yes," he answered. "When I came, two weeks ago, the Patriarch was not wholly blind, and he was very kind to me. I learned to love the gentle soul of the man, and in a way, skeptical though I was, I felt his power; but I never realized until this afternoon how stupendous, how immeasurable it was."

"Let us go to the cottage, then," suggested Thornton. "Nada, dear, let me help you. It is quite a little distance, and—"

She put out her hands in a happy, intimate way to hold him off.

"You can't realize it, Robert, can you? That dear, practical business head of yours makes it even harder for you than it is for me—and I can hardly realize it myself. But I am cured, dear, and I'm well and strong, and I don't need any help. Why, Robert, I am going to help you now, instead of always being a source of worry and anxiety to you. Come, let us go."

"If you will walk slowly," suggested Madison, "I'll speak to the little Holmes boy and his parents and bring them with us."

With a nod Madison turned away, the tense expression on his face assumed again, and presently he was talking to Mr. and Mrs. Holmes and patting the boy's head in a clumsy, overwrought fashion.

"I—I don't dare to go," and Mrs. Holmes clutched wildly at the boy, still sobbing.

"But Mrs. Thornton is going," urged Madison gently, "and I know your gratitude is not less than hers—it couldn't be less, with this little lad restored to you. I am sure you want to show it, don't you?"

"I think we'd better go, ma," said Mr. Holmes uneasily.

The boy put his hand in Madison's.

"I want to go, mister," he choked.

"Take me, mister, won't you?"

"Yes, I think we'd better go," repeated Mr. Holmes. "Come along, ma."

And he took his wife's arm.

It was a strange group—the Thornton's, rich, refined, to whom luxury was necessity; the Holmeses, poor, uncultured, coarsely dressed, and Madison, who walked with set face, head lowered a little, his pace slowing perceptibly—humbly, it seemed—the nearer he came to the cottage door.

Neither Thornton nor Holmes nor Holmes' wife spoke. Mrs. Thornton's arm was hung around the boy's shoulder, and he kept looking up into her fearful face. There was a bond between them that, young as he was, held him in its thrall. Out across the lawn, dotted here and there in knots and groups and little crowds, men and women stopped where they stood and watched, making no effort to follow, and some at the renewed evidence of the miraculous once more so vividly before their eyes dropped again to their knees.

They reached the door, and Madison drew back a little and, with the others, waited silently after he had knocked. Then the door opened slowly, and Helena, slim and girlish in her simple white dress, appeared upon the threshold. Her great dark eyes traveled slowly from one to another, and then her face lighted with a gentle smile.

"Miss Vail," began Madison diffidently, "this is Mrs. Thornton and her husband and the little lad, with his parents, who owe so much to the Patriarch, and they have come to—"

"To try to say a little of what is in their hearts," Mrs. Thornton stepped impulsively forward and held out her hands to Helena; then, breaking down suddenly, she began to sob, and the two were in each other's arms.

The two women passed inside the cottage, Mrs. Thornton holding out her hand again to the little lad, while Holmes and his wife followed hesitantly, awed. In the rear Thornton grasped Madison's arm suddenly.

"I never saw such a beautiful face," he whispered tensely. "It's wonderful."

"Yes," assented Madison. "But everything here seems full of a rare, strange beauty, a hallowed something—it lifts one beyond material things. You feel it—a great, calm solemnity all about you."

He closed the door softly behind him. Mrs. Thornton's eyes swept questioningly, anxiously, and a little timidly about the plain, quiet room, and then she spoke, her voice unconsciously hushed:

"He—he is not here?"

Helena shook her head as she led Mrs. Thornton to a chair.

"Not now," she replied in a low voice. "The strain of this afternoon has left him weary and very tired—much has gone out of him in response to the faith he felt but could not see."

"But he knows?" said Mrs. Thornton eagerly, reaching for Helena's hand. "He knows?"

"Yes," Helena answered quietly, "he knows. He always knows." She nodded gravely to the others. "Please sit down."

Madison quietly took the chair nearest the table; Thornton one a little in front of Madison and nearer his wife and Helena, who were close by the big open fireplace; the two Holmeses sat down on the edges of chairs a little behind Madison, while young Holmes knelt, his arms in Mrs. Thornton's lap, his head turned a little sideways, his chin cupped in one hand as he stared breathlessly around him.

It was the boy who broke the momentary silence.

"Ain't that other fellow here, neither—the fellow that was worse'n me?" he whispered.

Helena leaned toward him.

"Yes; he is here," she answered, smiling sweetly. "He is with the Patriarch."

She lifted her head to include the others in her words. "It is very wonderful, his gratitude. He will not leave him ever, that all he has to give for the debt he owes is the life the Patriarch gave back to him, and he will listen to nothing but that he should devote that life to the Patriarch's service."

"I'd like to, too," Young Holmes spoke with a quick flush on his face.

"Can I, miss—can I?"

"Perhaps," said Helena gently. "Who knows what there may be that you can do?"

"Dear boy," said Mrs. Thornton, stroking the lad's head. She looked quickly at Helena. "We, too, are grateful, more than there are words to tell, and we, too, would like to show our gratitude. We are rich and money—"

CHAPTER XI.
Real Money.

"MONEY!" The word came in a shocked, hurt interruption from Helena as a signal flashed from Madison's eyes.

"The Patriarch does not do these things for money. It would be a bitter grief to him to be misjudged in that way even in thought. It is the love in his heart for the suffering ones, and his power goes out to all who ask it freely, with no thought of recompense or gain, and his joy and happiness are the joy and happiness of others."

"And right off the bat, too!" said Madison admiringly to himself. "Now wouldn't that get you? Say, could you beat it—could you beat it?"

"Oh, I did not mean that," and Mrs. Thornton spoke almost piteously.

"Please, please do not think so, for I know so well that money, in a personal sense, could have no place here, that it would indeed be sacrilege. It is in quite another way, Robert, Mr. Madison, you explain what we should like to do."

It was Madison who explained.

"It is Mrs. Thornton's idea, Miss Vail," he said earnestly, "and it is one that I know will realize the Patriarch's dearest wish—to extend his sphere of helpfulness to others, to reach out to all who are stricken and have faith to come. I remember his writing that on the slate he used for conversation before his sight was completely taken from him. I remember the words as though they were before me now—I have dreamed often of a wider field, of reaching out to help the thousands beyond this little town; it would be wonderful joy."

"Yes," said Helena in a suppressed voice.

"In a way," Madison went on gravely, "his dream is already realized. What has happened here this afternoon will in a few hours be known to the whole civilized world, and there will be no room for incredulity or doubt. On whatever ground people see fit to base their belief, they must see fit to believe, and believing, they will come here in ever increasing numbers. But this little village is totally in-

On whatever ground people see fit to base their belief, they must see fit to believe, and believing, they will come here in ever increasing numbers. But this little village is totally in-quite to accommodate them. At first, yes, as I said to Mrs. Thornton, but afterward—no. Mrs. Thornton's idea—Mr. Thornton's idea and my own, if I may say so—is to build and endow a great sanitarium that, in consonance with the Patriarch's ideals, shall be free to all, and we feel that the money for this purpose will come gladly and spontaneously, as it so appropriately should come, from those who find joy and peace and health again at the Patriarch's hands."

Helena half rose from her chair as she stole a veiled glance at Madison.

"It would be wonderful," she said, with a little catch in her voice. "And he—it would be the one thing in the world for him. But—but it would take a great deal of money."

"Yes," said Madison slowly; "at least half a million."

Thornton turned toward Madison.

"As much as that?" he asked tentatively.

"I should say so," replied Madison thoughtfully. "You see, it's the endowment, after all, that is the most important. Say that the building and equipment cost only a hundred thousand, that would only leave an income from the other four hundred thousand, at 6 per cent, of $24,000—not enough in itself even, but it would be augmented, of course, by the contributions that would still come in."

Thornton nodded his head.

"That is so," he agreed. "But there is the time to consider. It would take a long time to raise that amount."

"No," rejoined Madison; "a few months at the outside. Thornton"—he reached out and laid his hand impressively on the other's sleeve—"we are not dealing with ordinary things here. We have witnessed this afternoon a sight that should teach us now, here in this very room, beside us now, your wife, that little boy, is evidence of power beyond what we have ever known before. Have we not that same power to count on still? It would be an ingrate heart indeed that, owing all, returned nothing."

"Yes," murmured Mrs. Thornton.

"Mr. Madison is right. I know it; I feel it—the money will come faster than we have any idea of."

Madison smiled at her quietly.

"It will come," he continued. "People will give their money, their jewels, anything, and give joyfully. And until the amount in hand is large enough to warrant beginning operations Miss Vail naturally will be its guardian."

"I?" said Helena hesitantly. "I—I am only a girl. I should not know what to do."

"You would not have to do anything, Miss Vail," Madison told her reassuringly. "When the time comes for advice, the making of plans and the carrying of them out, the brightest minds in this country will be offered freely, you will see."

"And meanwhile," inquired Thornton—he had been studying Helena's profile intently—"would you propose keeping the contributions here?"

"Of course!" said Madison. "And not only here, but openly displayed, as an added incentive for others to give if added incentive be needed. Here, for instance—he rose as he spoke, went to the mantel over the fireplace and lifted down a quaint, japanned box, fashioned in the shape of a little chest, which he placed upon the table. "And here, too"—he crossed to the bookshelves in the alcove and took down a very old, flexible covered book. "Once," he said, "the Patriarch showed me this. It was a blank book originally, half of it is blank still, but in the front, in the Patriarch's own writing, is an essay he wrote in the years gone by on 'The Power of Faith'—what could be more fitting than that the remaining pages should be filled with a record of the contributions to that faith?"

He laid the book on the table beside the little chest and sat down again.

"There is no display, no ornamentation in this; it is simplicity, those things serving which are first at hand, as it seems to me it should be; those who give record their names and gifts in this book; the little chest to hold the gifts is open, free to the inspection of all."

"But is that wise?" demurred Thornton. "So large a sum of money as must accumulate to be left openly about? Would it not be a temptation to some to steal? Might it not even endanger Miss Vail and the Patriarch himself—subject them, indeed, to attack?"

"I get your idea," said Madison to himself, while he gazed at Thornton in pained surprise, "but there'll never be more than the day's catch in the box at a time, though, of course, you don't know that. You see, we'll empty it every night and start it off fresh every morning with a trinket or two put back for bait. I'm glad you mentioned it, though; it's a little detail I mustn't forget to speak to the Flopper about."

Aloud he said, and there was a sort of shocked awe in his voice: "Steal—here in this sacred place! No man would dare—the most hardened criminal would draw back. Why do even we who sit here speak as we have been speaking with hushed and lowered voices? That very sense of a presence unseen around us, that hovers over us, is a mightier safeguard than the strongest bolts and locks, than the steel barred vaults of any bank. It would seem, indeed, to profane our own faith even to entertain such an idea. To me this place is a solemn shrine, and there are only purity and faith and stillness here, the dwelling place of a power as compassionate as it is mighty."

Madison stopped abruptly, and a silence fell. Each seemed busy with his or her own thoughts. About them were quiet stillness, peace. Twilight was falling, and a soft, mellow light filled the room.

PERSISTENCE

THERE are two reasons for the necessity of persistence in advertising.—One of them is the ease with which the human mind forgets, and the other is the necessity of teaching the good points of your products a little at a time. It is a general experience, not only in advertising, but in all the different phases of business, that the concern which does not constantly remind its customers of its existence soon has no existence of which to remind them.

Now, Mr. Merchant, if you would have the readers of this paper as customers, you must not only let them know you are in business, but keep persistently the merits of your store and goods before them, letting them know of the arrival of every novelty, as well as the more staple lines, besides keeping them posted as to prices.

"No one would dare." The words came from Mrs. Thornton breathlessly. Madison's hand went to his pocket. Slowly he drew out his check book and laid it upon the table.

"I am not a rich man"—his voice was very low, very earnest—"but I feel that this is something deeper, grander, bigger than anything the world has perhaps ever known before—something higher and above one's own self. It seems as though here were the chrysalis that, once developed to its perfect state, would sweep pain and sorrow from suffering humanity. It is as though a new, glad era had dawned for all mankind. I am glad to give and humbly proud to have a part in this."

He took out his fountain pen, opened the check book and began to write.

Thornton leaned forward, watching him.

Silence fell again. There was no

There is a big time awaiting you at Picton Fair on Thursday, September 20th. Splendid music by the 48th Highlanders of Toronto, splendid exhibits of pure-bred Holsteins, Short-horns and Jerseys, splendid exhibits of horses, splendid exhibits of sheep, splendid exhibits of swine, splendid exhibits of fine arts, paintings, school children's work, dairy products, etc. Take in the C.N.R. excursion to Picton on above date and enjoy the splendid feast of good things the Picton people have prepared for you.

William Cross, M.A., LL.B., has been appointed a member of the Military Exemption Tribunal for this district.

J. B. Lowery is in Madoc today in connection with his official work of testing the herds of the following three cheese factories.—Alexandria, Brook Valley and Springhill. He intends extending the work next season in Madoc section.

The anniversary and re-opening of Union Church, Eldorado, will be held on Sunday, September 16th. Rev. J. A. Connell, of Newcastle, a former pastor, will conduct the services. Rev. T. Wallace will also be present. The morning service will be held at 10.30, evening at 7.30 and Sunday School Rally at 2.30.

Picton Fair is going to be a hummer this year, a fair that you cannot afford to miss. Every comfort will be provided on the grounds for those who visit the fair. There is a good rest room for the ladies. Pure spring water will be provided in abundance, and good hot meals will be served in the dining hall. Take in the C.N.R. excursion on September 20th to this, the model County Fair of the province.

The Cobourg World reports an instance of a Mr. Jibb, on his 83rd birthday, August 18th, shocking grain in the harvest field. The North Hastings Review can show something even better than this. Mr. Charles O'Hara, who will be 86 on November 2nd of this year, has this summer on different occasions gone out to the harvest field and assisted in stooking grain.

The standard for all Plow making in Canada is the Wilkinson and has been for years; a plow perfectly designed for its job. M. W. Connor & Son.

The Woman's Missionary Society of St. Peter's Church spent a pleasant afternoon on Thursday last at the home of Mrs. William McMechan where the monthly meeting was held. The topic for the day was the Y. M. C. A. and the work it is doing in connection with the war; and the various readings brought out much interesting information regarding the extent of this work, the inestimable value of it for our soldiers, and the way in which it is prized by them.

A day replete with pleasure and instruction awaits all those who take in the C.N.R. excursion to Picton Fair on Thursday, September 20th. Next to Toronto, London and Ottawa, Picton Fair ranks as the fourth best in the Province, and this year the Directors are making greater efforts than ever to make it still bigger and better than ever before.

Obituary

VERONICA MCFARLANE
Death has once more robbed this community of one of its youthful and promising young ladies in the person of Miss Veronica McFarlane. Although confined to her bed for a short time the dread disease of typhoid must have already done its work for she passed away within a week, although everything that medical skill and tender care could do was done for her. Her mother, Mrs. McFarlane, has the sympathy of the community in her very sad bereavement, which seems doubly sad as only two years ago she lost her beloved husband from the same disease. The large crowd that followed the remains to Sacred Heart Church, Madoc on Monday showed the sympathy they felt for the bereaved widow and friends. R. I. P.

JOHN KEHOE

The death took place on Wednesday, 5th inst., of John Kehoe, sr., one of the oldest settlers of Elzevir. He had been in very poor health for some time; having plenty of time to prepare for the final summons every moment was given to prayer and consideration of his eternal destiny. His funeral to Sacred Heart Church, Madoc, last Friday was largely attended. R. I. P.

MRS. S. J. WALKER

Belleville, Ontario.—Many citizens of Madoc heard with deep regret of the death of Mrs. S. J. Walker, who died Saturday at the General Hospital, Kingston. The deceased was 68 years old and well known in Madoc. She was brought to the hospital about two months ago. The remains were sent to Madoc for interment. The funeral service was held in the Presbyterian church on Monday.

Epworth League Re-organized

The League of the Madoc Methodist Church met for re-organization on Tuesday evening, September 11th. The following officers were elected:—President—Dr. Tremeneur. 1st Vice-Pres.—Miss Jennie Holmes. 2nd Vice-Pres.—Miss Minnie O'Hara. 3rd Vice-Pres.—Miss Laura Connor. 4th Vice-Pres.—Miss G. Aylsworth. Secretary—Mr. Burton McBain. Treasurer—Dr. Fraser. Pianist—Miss Verna Christie.

"The Boy" at the Fair

Mr. Charles W. O'Hara, otherwise known as "the Boy" of Madoc was in the city yesterday taking in Belleville's big exhibition and calling upon some of his old friends, among them the editor of the Ontario. According to the calendar Mr. O'Hara is now a year older than when we last saw him, and in November next the register will show that he has passed his 50th milestone. But he is still a youth in appearance and in spirits. His faculties are still apparently not impaired to the slightest degree and he enjoys the society of his friends and all the good things of life with all the zest of a boy. This past summer he has assisted patriotism and production by planting and cultivating one of the best gardens in Madoc.—Belleville Ontario.

AN ARCTIC RESCUE

Tragedy of the Loss of the Karluk Off Wrangell Island.

PERILS OF THE SURVIVORS.

The Hardships and Sufferings They Braved and the Scene When the Rescue Ship From Alaska Was Sighted by the Camp on the Desolate Beach.

When the Karluk, the chief vessel of the Canadian arctic expedition which set out in June, 1913, became imprisoned by ice near Point Barrow, Alaska, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the commander of the party, went ashore with five companions to hunt caribou. He never saw his ship again, for soon after he left her a furious northeast gale sprang up and carried her westward.

Near Wrangell Island, which lies north of Siberia, the ship succumbed to the tremendous pressure of the ice and sank. Eight of the Karluk's company were lost in trying to reach land, but seventeen survivors under Captain Bartlett succeeded in reaching Wrangell

Island and on that unforgotten spot established a camp. From there Captain Bartlett, accompanied by one Eskimo, made the terribly difficult journey of eighty miles to the mainland of Siberia. He then went to Alaska and reported the fate of the Karluk.

Meanwhile Burt M. McConnell, the meteorologist of the expedition, who had left the Karluk with Stefansson, had made his way to Nome, Alaska. Here he joined Olaf Swenson, who had determined to go to the rescue in his little schooner King and Winge.

Almost eight months after the Karluk sank they sailed from Nome and, after encountering the usual difficulties of arctic navigation, successfully drew within sight of the cliffs and beach of Wrangell Island. Mr. McConnell tells the story of the rescue in Harper's Magazine:

"The lookout in the crow's nest sighted a tent when we were within two miles of shore, and as we came nearer, under full speed, we could see a flagpole and a cross.

Suddenly a man emerged from the tent on his hands and knees. He did not show any signs of joy. He did not wave his arms and shout when he sighted the ship. He merely rose and stood rigidly beside the tent, gazing at us as if dazed. More than once he brushed his hands across his eyes, as if he could not believe that the King and Winge was a real ship come to rescue him.

Our first fear was that the entire party, with the exception of the one man we saw, had perished, but that gloomy possibility was dispelled presently by the appearance of two other men. None of the trio made any demonstration. Aboard ship even the Eskimos were intensely excited.

The umiak was launched, and when it was within a hundred yards of the beach the man whom we had first seen started toward us, taking a rifle from its case. Our natives became greatly frightened. They pointed to their foreheads and muttered: "That man long time not much eat! Him crazy—all same fox!"

We landed on the beach and advanced toward this strange individual. His shaggy, matted hair streamed down over his eyes in wild disorder. His grimy face was streaked and furrowed with lines and wrinkles. I recognized him only by his voice when he spoke to Swenson. It was Munro.

"I don't know who you are, but I'm mighty glad to see you all," were his first words.

An instant later he recognized me and asked in astonishment, "How did you get here?"

Other questions were rapidly asked and answered, and then, "Have you a doctor aboard?" Munro demanded.

"You don't need a doctor," Swenson assured him. "What you need is a cook. We will go aboard and have breakfast."

Munro then came up, weak and emaciated. I did not recognize him until Munro spoke his name. He smiled in recognition, but was so visibly affected that I refrained from questioning him. Templeman next appeared. He was gaunt and very pale and seemed on the verge of a nervous breakdown. So we talked of general topics and asked no questions about their experiences.

Aboard the schooner the rescued men had a sumptuous breakfast, but an hour afterward they were hungry again.

"Mr. Swenson, I want to ask a great favor of you," Munro finally gained courage to say. "For several months I have been dreaming of eating a whole can of condensed milk with a spoon."

Three cans were immediately brought forth, as both Munro and Templeman confessed to a similar craving, and they ate that condensed milk as if it were ice cream.

At another camp forty miles away the King and Winge rescued nine other survivors. Three had died after reaching the island.

EYES IN PORTRAITS.

Why Some Always Seem to Gaze Right at You and Some Never Do.

You probably have noticed that some faces in pictures seem to follow you; also that in other pictures there are faces which are not looking at you, but no matter where you walk, even though it be in the direction in which they seem to be looking, you will never find the face looking at you. Indeed, faces in pictures are either looking at us from wherever we look at them or else they never look at us from wherever we look at them. The same is true of photographs.

The rule is very simple. If the person who was being painted or photographed was looking at the painter or the camera, then wherever you stand he will seem to be looking at you. If he was looking on one side, then wherever you stand he will seem to be looking on that side of you. This works very queerly if you have a group of people who were all looking at the camera when they were photographed. If you look at the photograph from one side they all seem to turn to follow you and then to turn back if you look at it from the other side. But if they were not looking at the camera you can never get them to look at you.

Vision Your Sons, Mothers of Canada!

Vision them at early morning when through the rising mists, there bursts a hurricane of fire---

See your valiant boys---calm, grim, but cheerful, "stand-to-arms" until the Hun's "morning hate" dies away.

Picture them at breakfast, the meal that must bring them the bodily sustenance to carry them through the strain of another day.

Then think what might happen if, one morning, there was no breakfast---no food, and word went down the lines that Canada had failed them.

Vision all these things, and then---as Women of Canada---Mothers of Men---Answer this Call to Service.

Canada must send to Her Own, and to the Allies Fighting Forces, more wheat, more beef, more bacon, and more of such other foods as are non-perishable and easily exported.

Canada can do this without depriving her own population of a fair share of any of these foods if You Women will but help.

All we ask of you is, that instead of buying so much white flour (if you do your own baking) you vary your baking by using one-third oatmeal, corn, barley or rye flour. Or, if you buy your bread, that you order a certain proportion of brown bread each day.

Second, instead of using as much beef and bacon as formerly, you vary your family's diet, by substituting for beef and bacon such equally nutritious foods as fish, peas, lentils, potatoes, nuts, bananas, etc.

Third, and this is most important,---positively prevent the waste of a single ounce of food in your household.

They Must Be Fed

Statistics show that, everyday, in Canada, sufficient food is thrown into garbage cans to feed the entire Canadian Overseas Army.

Travellers have often remarked that many a European family would live well upon the quantity and quality of food wasted in some Canadian homes.

Such waste is shameful at any time; but in these times it is criminal.

Women's Auxiliary, Organization of Resources Committee, in Co-operation with The Hon. W. J. Hanna, Food Controller.

Our only hope is that with these truths before you, and in view of the vital issues at stake, we may count upon your earnest co-operation in stopping this appalling waste; and in substituting other foods for the wheat, beef and bacon that must be sent overseas.

Next week a Food Service Pledge and Window Card will be delivered to you. It is your Dedication to War Service. The Window Card is your Emblem of Honour.

POULTRY AND EGGS

MORE HENS NEEDED.

Farmers Should Keep on Hatching Chicks Until July.

The nation is confronted with a serious shortage of laying hens, and farmers should do their part in solving one phase of the food supply problem by hatching more chicks than usual this season, believes Ross M. Sherwood, acting head of the Kansas State Agricultural college poultry department.

Because of the high feed prices farmers sold hens last fall that ordinarily would have been retained for breeding purposes and egg production. The low egg production this spring has been

The days will soon be here when the midday sun can do a lot of damage to stock exposed to it. This is probably more the case with chickens than it is with grown fowls; but, nevertheless, they all need it. Trees furnish the most cooling shade. Where trees are not available, canvas should be erected, made by driving stakes in the ground and covering the top with burlap. The picture shows such a contrivance.

Reports from the largest egg buyer in Kansas show that the egg production is from 20 to 40 per cent lower than it was a year ago, and last year's production was below normal. The government reports 38 per cent less eggs in cold storage on April 1 than at that time last year.

Give the laying hens more feed. They should have a good feed of grain at night and all the sour milk they can use during the day. The farmer should use the cheapest grain feed he has, whether corn, kafir or feterita. It is too common a practice on the Kansas farms to let the hens shift for themselves during the spring and summer, or, at most, to throw them a little grain. Birds fed in this way seldom give a profitable production the following fall and winter. The most serious shortage will come next November, December and January, unless precautionary measures are taken.

Keep on hatching until the 1st of July and have an abundance of young chicks to help bolster up the food shortage. Well fed chicks will weigh three pounds in fifteen to seventeen weeks, and this is a profitable time to put them on the market. It gives a larger carcass for food and is just as profitable for the farmer. A three pound chick will eat eight to ten pounds of feed in addition to what it picks up on the farm. There is money in them even at the high price of feed.

The pullets should be well fed so that they will be ready to lay before cold weather. Caution should be taken not to develop small breeds too early, for pullets laying before Sept. 15 are apt to molt in the fall and thus lose three months of egg production.

Increasing the Egg Supply.

The number of marketable eggs can be increased by following a few practical suggestions, says the United States department of agriculture. Among the most important of these are the production of the infertile egg after the breeding season is over and the proper handling of eggs by the farmer before sending them to market. The infertile egg is obtained when all male birds are removed from the flock. This does not decrease the number of eggs produced, but it does increase greatly their keeping qualities. The production of the infertile egg and the proper handling and marketing of eggs by the producer would increase tremendously the number of marketable eggs each year by diminishing the quantity that are rendered unfit for food.

Breeds For Small Flock.

For the family who wishes to keep poultry for home consumption rather than for the market the so called general purpose breeds are better suited than what are known as the egg laying breeds. Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Rhode Island Reds and Orpingtons are all good varieties for the average person who does not intend to go into the poultry business on a considerable scale. These breeds are good layers, and they also make good table poultry.

The Poultry House.

The prime essentials for a small poultry house are fresh air, dryness, sunlight and space enough to keep the birds comfortable. For the general purpose breeds about four square feet of floor space should be allowed for each bird. The fowls should also have as much outside space as possible to run in.

A VALUABLE BIRD.

The Rough Legged Hawk Is a Helpful Friend on the Farm.

An extremely helpful friend of ours, when bird friends are few, is the rough legged hawk, says a writer in Farm and Fireside. Unfortunately this bird is little known or valued. It reaches the United States from its northern breeding range in September and October, remaining until April.

It may be identified at a glance by its broad wings, its large size and the broad dark band which crosses its breast and under side of its wings. It is comparatively tame. The name rough legged or hare footed is made appropriate by the bird's full feathered legs and feet.

The coloration of the American rough leg and its more western subspecies, the ferruginous rough leg, varies from the type here described to almost solid black. In this darker phase the rough leg is commonly called the black hawk.

On such good authority as that of Dr. A. K. Fisher, under whose direction the United States biological survey made extensive field observations of this bird's feeding habits, it is stated: "The rough leg is one of man's most important allies against meadow mice, feeding on little else during its six months' sojourn in the United States. Other mice, rabbits and grown squirrels are taken occasionally."

THE MAKING OF PAPER.

Thrill Was the Order of the Day When Only Rag Stock Was Used.

It was in the year 1807 that the first wood pulp paper in the United States was manufactured, and it would be difficult to estimate the benefit this has conferred upon the world, for it was a step in the dissemination of knowledge, particularly current news, just as was the invention of movable types and the printing press.

It will be remembered by many still living with what care every rag was saved to be converted into paper in the days when only rag stock was used in its manufacture and how the paper, after it had served its purpose at the printer's, was carefully put aside for wrapping parcels. Those were days of automatic thrift, which were followed by disregard of economies so widespread that already, after only half a century, we are confronted by a prospect of serious shortage of supply of the new raw material.

Just as the supply of rags in the sixties would not have sufficed for growing needs, so it appears that soon there will not be enough wood pulp to go around. But we have grown so accustomed to finding substitutes when we had to have them that the world is not alarmed.

Imprisoned in the Wind.

Butterflies may be imprisoned and uninjured in the midst of a whirlwind. Gales in a genuine typhoon are so terrible that the stoutest ships can scarcely hope to weather them, but there is a spot at the very center of the storm where something like a dead calm prevails. From the outer edge of the disturbance, which may be 300 miles across, the wind velocity increases toward the center until within a few miles of that point there comes a sudden lull. There the rain ceases and the sky often clears. In this little calm area, which sailors call "the eye of the storm," a group of butterflies has frequently been imprisoned, and their dainty, delicate forms are as safe in this aerial cage as if hovering in sunny meadows, but as helpless as if in a collector's bottle.

Soap Bubbles and Portraits.

Professor Boys of England, experimenting with bubbles, obtained some very large ones, which in the sunshine changed colors so beautifully that he conceived the idea of using them as backgrounds for photographs.

The large bubbles were blown with an ordinary bellows, says the Popular Science Monthly. The soap solution was heated and a large mouthed funnel was dipped into it. The bellows, connected with the funnel, was then worked very gently. Bubbles with as great a circumference as two and a half feet were easily obtained.

Bananas.

Bananas, if they are unripe, may be used with advantage as a vegetable. Cut the fruit in halves, stew them for twenty-five minutes in just a little water, drain, cover them with a cream sauce such as you use for cauliflower, and serve them hot. The ripe fruit is a delicious garnish to meat. Cut round slices from ripe, firm bananas. Fry them in butter and lay a few on the top and around a broiled steak as it goes to table.

He Was Soured.

"Have you 'Love Letters of Was Men'?" she asked timidly.
"No, miss," responded the clerk in the book department.
"And why not?"
"Because wise men never write love letters."—London Telegraph.

September Cosmopolitan

Of course Robert W. Chambers' newest and best novel, "The Restless Sex," is the big feature of the new Cosmopolitan now on sale.

Next to that comes a story by Fannie Hurst, "Get ready for the wreaths," is this popular writer's masterpiece up to date. There is a tear and a smile in almost every line.

Gouverneur Morris is there with a tale of terror and romance, entitled "The Purple Plank." This popular writer appears again after a long interval. His new story is a gripper.

Theodore Dreiser makes his appearance in September Cosmopolitan with a story entitled "Married." Every reader will feel a sympathetic understanding with Marjorie and Duet as they endeavor to adjust themselves to their new relation and environment.

"Blue Aloes," by Cynthia Stockley, is continued. This is a three part mystery story of South Africa, land of adventure and romance. Read the synopsis of the first installment and be sure to finish this remarkable narrative.

Herbert Kaufman writes about the Morgans father and son. The personalities of these colossal figures of finance are depicted in Kaufman's wonderfully picturesque phraseology.

C. N. and A. M. Williamson write of "The Adventure of Jose," the girl in search of a husband. A motoring romance of rare entertainment.

Lillie Langtry, the famous beauty writes her reminiscences for Cosmopolitan readers in "Myself and Others." In this issue she tells of her acquaintance with Oscar Wilde.

Jack London's "Michael," the greatest dog story ever written, is in this number. Also a new Fable in Slang by George Ade, the philosopher in cap and bells. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is represented by a great wailing poem entitled, "The Messengers." Mary Roberts Rhinehart writes of her camping trip in Northwestern Rockies.

A Free War Map

Every home in Canada should have a map of the great war area in Europe to see where our Canadian boys are fighting. The colored map offered free with the family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal is complete in every detail. It is the best map published. The subscription price of the Family Herald is now $1.25 a year but to make up the difference to our subscribers this great map which could not be produced under two dollars a copy except in such large quantities is given free to all subscribers new and renewal who pay a year's subscription $1.25. It is a great big bargain indeed.

General Sir Arthur Currie told a Canadian newspaper man to-day that the troops in the field want more men whether it be by conscription or raised by voluntary methods. So far the morale of the Canadian troops has been well maintained, stated the general, by knowledge that reinforcements are always forthcoming.

In the last action our casualties were only one-third of the German losses, as we had accounted for 60 of their battalions. The enemy had lately retaliated with numerous counter-attacks, but those had been successfully met by new plans.

One Man in Four to Go

Major George I. Campbell, C. R. O., spoke to 200 people in the village of Lonsdale on Friday evening. The film "Canada in khaki" was used and afterwards the major gave his explanation of the military Service Act. He will deliver this address throughout the district.

It has been estimated that in about 18 months with the present rate of casualties there would be none of the five Canadian divisions left in the field. The casualties, etc., would entirely break up the organization.

To handle this serious matter in a business like way, the Government was now using the Military Service Bill. When the various tribunals are appointed and the places at which they will sit has been decided on a proclamation will be issued which will start the machinery to bring the act into force.

It has not been definitely settled as to the details, but in all probability a single eligible man will appear before this exemption Board. The case of each will be examined and those men who can best be spared will be chosen. They will be signed up and following that a medical examination will take place. This will decide on the class in which the man examined is in. If in Class "A" he will be put into forestry. If in Class "B" he will go into forestry. If in Class "C" his papers will be filed, the man sent home and in the future he is needed.

Major Campbell said: I believe that only one man in four between the ages of 20 and 34—those liable for service—will be called on the first draft. I estimate that there are 400,000 young men still in the dominion and the act calls for only a quarter of that number.

Another Peace Move Expected from Enemy

Germany will soon make another peace proposal, diplomats in touch with foreign affairs declared to-day, and it will be a proposal tempered in its outlines by the more radical of German Reichstag elements.

The Eruberger-Scheidemann group is taking advantage of President Wilson's peace views and internal reform ideas to further its plans. This group is expected to force the new proposal at the opening of the Reichstag.

Some diplomats declared that the proposed Eruberger-Scheidemann group will overthrow the bureaucratic Chancellor Michaelis and put Germany well along the way to democratization.

Strathorn, Brixton; Kerrington, then into Westminster. Previous to crossing the river Thames by Westminster bridge we passed St. Thomas' hospital. Facing on our right in course of construction was County Hall, an immense building of stone being erected at a cost of 3 million pounds. Crossing over the river on our left lay the Houses of Parliament. Towering above was Big Ben, the noted clock.

Facing Big Ben and on corner of the Thames embankment is a statue by Thornicroft of Boadicea in a chariot driving 3 galloping horses. Further up the embankment was Westminster Abbey. We returned along the embankment passing on our left the noted headquarters of the Metropolitan Police force. Here we took an upper deck on a tram car and passed under Charing Cross railway bridge.

Further along is Cleopatra's Needle guarded by two bronze sphinxes, formed from Egyptian stone, being sunk in the Bay of Biscay and were recovered and placed in present position. Passing under Waterloo bridge on our left lay Summer's House where all records of births, marriages and deaths are kept. Took a byturning on our left and reached the Strand, down which we proceeded to Trafalgar Square, saw the monument erected in memory of Lord Nelson. This is a fine piece of art, 4 large lions surrounded by fountains and ornamental water. Facing us is Spring Gardens, the present headquarters of London County Council, also addition of the Strand, the old London park. Turning we proceeded down White Hall. There we went through the Horse Guards, headquarters of Life Guards, fortunate enough to see change of guards, a lovely sight, men 6 feet high mounted on lovely black chargers. Going then to St. James park war economy was shown in the draining of beautiful pools. Through the park we reached Queen Victoria monument; facing us was Buckingham Palace, the town residence of the King and Queen. No great architectural beauty. Then walked to Chelsea where I had exterior view of Grenadier Depot; facing this enclosed within railing is the Royal Hospital, where live the few survivors of the Balacava charge and Crimean veterans. These men wear the old-fashioned shako, the coat long bright scarlet, trousers dark blue, wearing medals innumerable. From Chelsea we went by tube underground railway to Victoria, where we lunched at a Y.M.C.A. hut. Fortunate while here to have a good view (I was mounted on top of a stone pillar) of the first contingent of American troops passing through London and the welcome accorded them was one of great enthusiasm. Bands and pipers of Grenadier Guards and Welsh Guards played marching airs. They numbered 4000 strong. They have seen far smarter Canadian corps.

From here we took the underground tube to the Bank of England, Mansion House and Stock Exchange. Was impressed with manner in which police conducted traffic, finest organized body of men in the world. From here along King William street, at bottom of which is erected his monument, proceeding along East Cheap and down on our left is the mint where the English money is made. Practically opposite this and on the bank of the river, stands the Tower of London, an old building surrounded by an immense moat which in olden days was flooded but at present is dry and used as a parade ground for training men of the Imperial Army. We had free admittance and were taken over the various old portions of the Tower. Leaving this building we walked along the Terrace facing the Tower and saw Tower bridge open to allow a sailing vessel to pass through. It is a fine bridge and one of the sights of London. Proceeded then in direction of the noted St. Paul's Cathedral, passing on our way London bridge, which has great historical associations. We entered St. Paul's and were at once struck by wonderful architecture and beauty. I do not believe anything, as far as buildings here concerned, can other compare with its interior. We descended to the crypt and saw the tombs of many of the men who have made England what she is today. It is here that Wellington, the victor of Waterloo, and Nelson, the sailor hero of Trafalgar, are buried. With reluctance I left the old building. A service was in progress. We took tube to Marble Arch, a structure facing the entrance to Hyde park. Entering the park on our left is Park Lane, the town residence of an English society, which is of no English or English beauty. Walking through and down to Victoria, boarding a tram car here we booked for Brixton, a busy suburb of London, then mounted a motor bus en route to the Crystal Palace. This building is an immense structure of steel and glass, and was originally erected in Hyde park for the great International Exhibition of 1870. It has since been moved to its present site some 600 ft. above sea level. We then took car through Anerley, Penge, South Norwood, Selhurst into Croydon. Then we walked to the road leading to the Crystal Palace. We got into our way from man with a pony and cart. Leaving him we struck across country and got a supper of bread, cheese and cocoa at a cottage. The women were very concerned as to our fate when we got back to the hospital and offered to send us something to eat in the out of our receiving punishment. Approaching the camp very stealthily we crawled under the barbed wire, unobserved by the pickets on guard, reaching our ward in safety and to spend a night in bed after a tiring and strenuous day. London is not noted for its beauty in any respects our Canadian cities have it over London like a tent. I can pride myself upon seeing the noted places of historical interest in that ancient and largest city of the world. When I get my landing leave I shall be able to describe Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Inverness, Scotland, and will try and make old Dublin.

Germany Must Pay Damages

HOW much will enemy Governments owe Great Britain for their flagrant violation of the laws of civilized warfare? asks The London Mirror.

Although it is as yet impossible to give even an approximate estimate of the claims which British subjects are making, the books of account are being prepared, and the credit side of the ledger is bound to assume stupendous proportions.

The claims against enemy Governments are for the most part either—

1. Claims for compensation in respect of property belonging to British subjects which had been requisitioned, confiscated, or sequestered by an enemy Government, or—

2. Claims for compensation in respect of loss caused by the destruction of life or property on sea or land by acts contrary to the laws of war.

Before the war broke out there were some money due to British subjects from enemy Governments. These claims arose from the supply of goods such as machinery, food, stuffs, and merchandise of all sorts to foreign Governments—outstanding debts due or accruing at that date.

There were also in some cases pensions due from foreign Governments to British subjects formerly in their employ.

Then when the war broke out and a "state of war" was formally declared, it gave to enemy Governments certain conditional rights which they did not before possess. One was the right to requisition goods belonging to "the enemy."

Great quantities of British goods warehoused at Hamburg and elsewhere were on the outbreak of war thus requisitioned.

The Government of the country in which enemy goods are warehoused is entitled to requisition "commodities," they call it in South Africa, anything they desire, from a man's hat to a company's gasworks or omnibus.

This seizure, however, is subject to the liability of the requisitioning Government to pay for the goods when the state of war comes to an end.

Under The Hague Convention, when a state of war arises belligerents have the right to detain merchant ships of the enemy with the obligation to return them to their owners at the end of the war. Whether there exists the obligation to maintain them in good repair is an open question.

Since the outbreak of war Germany has sequestered much British property, and the owners have the right to ask for its return, or compensation, after the war.

If it has consisted of a business it may have been "improved," and if so the owner would have no claim if ever fortunate enough to be reinstated in his property.

The "wrongful acts" of the enemy, which have resulted, on the other hand, in many of the claims, include the indiscriminate sowing of mines and the sinking-without-notice policy of German submarines.

These two items have been fruitful sources of personal damage and loss of life and property, for which in the ordinary course of justice compensation would have to be paid.

The enemy has a right to capture merchant vessels and, if unable to take them into port as "prize," to sink them; but there is no justification and no precedent for the many flagrant outrages of which Germany has been guilty, of endangering and sacrificing the lives of passengers and crews of neutral as well as enemy ships.

Full compensation for such wrongful acts is to be demanded, and scores of claims have already been filed.

There are cases, again, of British firms and companies which had established businesses in enemy countries before the war.

Most, if not all, of these concerns in Germany have been placed under official control, and some have been sequestered.

At the end of the war the British owners will have a claim against the enemy Government in respect of the property which has been sequestered.

Insurance companies and underwriters have filed very large claims against Germany in respect of losses of merchant vessels, and there are claims by the former for premiums due from enemy insurance offices as well as for losses under reinsurance treaties with such companies.

A Loyal Husband

Lady Smith-Dorrien, who is engaged in adding to the comforts of wounded British soldiers in English hospitals, tells an amusing and affecting story of a private soldier who had just recovered from a severe wound, according to The Youth's Companion. Feeling ill and very homesick, he went to headquarters to obtain leave of absence. "I haven't seen my wife for more than a year," he said in a most dejected manner. "Why," said the colonel to whom he had applied, "I haven't seen my wife for nearly two years!" "Well," said the soldier, earnestly and respectfully, "that may be, sir, but me and my wife aren't that kind!" The furlough was immediately granted.

Another Prophet Discredited

The abdication of King Constantine will disappoint those who believe in prophecy. Like Constantine the Great, he married a convert named Euphrosia, and there is a tradition centuries old and much quoted in Greece at the time of his marriage to the effect that "when a Constantine and a Euphrosia shall come more reign in Europe." The prophecy will be proved to be false.

Events of The War in Brief

Korniloff's attempt to upset the Provisional Government in Russia and secure the office of dictator for himself has collapsed. In order to avoid division of effort in dealing with Korniloff, while that general was at the head of an insurgent army, the Provisional Government last week placed supreme power in the hands of Kerensky. Now the Korniloff has gone under the other K. remains dictator with no one person or group of persons apparently strong enough to dispute his sway. And yet, as if in a spirit of irony, the same despatches that convey the information, declare that Russia has been formally proclaimed a Republic.

In other political fields connected with the war no important developments have occurred in the week. The Cabinet crisis in France does not yet appear to have passed but the disturbing news has come through in regard to the situation there, and from England there is nothing further to record as to the attitude of Labor towards movements looking towards peace.

In the fields of action the week has been wholly devoid of great events. On the Eastern front, coincident with the collapse of the Korniloff revolt, Russia's resistance to the German advance seems to have stiffened somewhat. On the western front, despite the daily toll of losses, not enough ground has apparently been gained by either side to make a truck garden.

The most important news comes from the Italian front. The Italian army is the only army on the allied side which has, aside from spasmodic and seemingly futile efforts in Asia Minor, carried the war into enemy territory and maintained it there. Now with the Austrian port of Trieste apparently within their grasp, it is announced that the Italian troops will, without relaxing efforts on their own front, attempt to put a little life into the Balkan campaign, which has been in a state of somnolence for months, by beginning a vigorous offensive there as well.

The Italian, it is reported, still hopes for peace and will continue to work for its realization. Germany has just answered his last proposals. The United States works effectively for peace by putting the northern hemisphere, who are still dividing their cards with Germany, on ration. There is no sign of peace on the battlefronts. Interest shifted last week to the conflict between Italy and Austria in which Italy has been making headway in her effort to round the tip of Venice and take Trieste from the rear.

BY LORD NORTHCLEIFF

I do not believe there is any active hostility among either people to the conception of such an agreement. There was hostility in the past. For a hundred years England has regarded the United States as their hereditary foe. Writing in the thirties of the nineteenth century, De Tocqueville said: "One could not find more bitter hatred than that which exists between the American and the English." "Twisting the Lion's Tail" was a popular diversion among American politicians. American children were taught in their schools to hate England and to look forward to revenge upon her. That period has passed away. There are no more English developed into the British Empire. The people of United States could feel no grudge ranking in their breasts against the people of Canada, of Australia, of New Zealand, of South Africa. The new Americans, who were for the most part ignorant of the causes which had set their country in opposition to the English. They could not be expected to carry on a feud about which they knew nothing. The German language newspapers try hard to keep up the old, bitter feeling against England, but they are not successful in moving the very limited sense. Even the Irish in the United States leave the venomous anti-British propaganda to a small and relative feeble section of professional extremists. Nowhere, I believe, would there be anything like enough opposition to prevent the English-speaking peoples from agreeing upon some form of Federation, if it were clear that great practical advantage would flow from it.

What likelihood is there of the British Empire and the United States being forced to decide that Federation would be mutually advantageous? The answer to that question depends upon how far Absolutism is discredited at the end of the war. Will there still rage, after peace has been made, the strife of principles which has been going on ever since the idea of "Government of the people by the people for the people" was proclaimed? Will the principle which draws its law from the will of the people be strong enough after the war to make an end of the Prussian principle which in the words of Bismarck, "sets the authority created by God, on authority by the grace of God? In other words can the world be freed from the threat of being dominated by the mediocre, but greedy Hohenzollern family? We cannot yet say.

All we can say is that up to now the German people have shown no sign of any combined desire to make their will predominate over the authority claimed by the Prussian Kaiser as having been conferred upon him "by the grace of God." They still humbly prostrate themselves before the fetish of Divine Right. They still acquiesce in government by a hereditary military despotism. They are still deluded. They are still sheep. And so long as one hundred millions of people in the centre of Europe (I take the approximate number of Germans as Germany and Austria), so long as these hundred millions are so foolish as to support Absolutism, claiming that the right to rule irresponsibly by Divine appointment, so long will it be necessary to keep perpetual watch upon absolutism, to isolate those who support it, and by every means possible to rob it of the opportunity to plunge the whole world into war.

There was a time not very long ago when the American people would have said: "What does it matter to us whether absolutism exists in Europe or not? We are outside of all the old world's squabbles. We mean to keep outside of them." The mass of the American people were until lately still under the impression that the words of Washington spoken in 1796 were applicable to the conditions of today. "The nations of Europe," Washington said in his farewell oration, "Have important problems which do not concern us as a free people. The causes of their frequent misunderstandings lie far outside of our province, and the circumstance that America is geographically remote will facilitate our political isolation."

Strange how long the delusion prevailed that the United States were "geographically remote" from Europe. Steam arrived and immediately reduced their remoteness; faster and faster the steamship service became until it vanished altogether. The mass of the American people did not appreciate the change. They continued to think of Europe as lying outside their province. They continued to interest themselves exclusively in internal, in local politics, disregarding all that lay beyond.

The crops are really splendid and would have been better except for frost three nights in succession. There has been a fair good crop of wild fruits, huckleberries splendid. Since the wild fruit supply is exhausted Old Bruin thinks as some people do that "The world owes me a living." A fine lamb was killed, from indications by a bear, in Mr. P. Bradshaw's pasture and one belonging to Mr. Fulton, who caught the bear in a trap. A lynx was seen one day by a traveller a short distance from where Mr. Bradshaw's lamb was killed.

He Won The Bet

But He Took a Big Risk.

By ETHEL HOLMES

Half a dozen youngsters made up a bunch of boys whose principal object was to do something odd. No sooner did one of them suggest anything out of the ordinary than one or more of the others offered to bet him that he wouldn't do it, and it must be confessed that the bet was usually taken.

Jim Wardlaw was the most venturesome of these young men, and it was not safe to propose any breakneck adventure and offer him good odds that he dared not perform it, for the more risky it was the surer he was to go into it.

"It's singular," said Jim Wardlaw to several friends sitting around a table at their club, "that a love of danger there is in man. A war breaks out, and it seems as if every young fellow is wild to get himself killed. Who would suppose that men could be found to go up in the air in flying machines to fight other men in other flying machines?"

"I suppose," remarked one of the party, "that this same love of danger is what tempts men in a different sphere of life to break into other men's houses."

"I don't see any great danger in that," said Wardlaw. "The burglar is armed, and the other fellow is not."

Then followed an animated discussion as to the risks attending house-breaking, at the end of which Billy Nevins, a wealthy young bachelor, bet Wardlaw $100 that he would enter a dwelling house and carry away some article to prove that he had actually committed a burglary. Wardlaw was to name the house, but Nevins was to accept or reject the nomination as he saw fit. The burglar was to carry with him such tools as would enable him to effect an entrance.

The mere fact that a love for danger is inherent in man was proved by this absurd bet. They put the matter in writing, and every man would be ready in case Nevins was caught in the act to testify that it was not a bona fide robbery, but a gentleman's agreement.

On the night appointed for the burglary the party met at Nevins' room and found him appropriately dressed for the proposed work. That is to say, he had tried to dress himself appropriately. He had on a suit of his cast off clothes on which he had rubbed ashes and soot from his fireplace and an old felt hat in which he had punched some holes. But it cannot be said with truth that he made a typical burglar. By inheritance he was a gentleman, and this fact stood out despite his disguise.

His burlesque appearance having been approved by the party, he and Wardlaw took the latter's motorcar and went to the scene of the proposed depredation, or, rather, to a corner near the house. Nevins got out, and Wardlaw rejoined the party who had remained in Nevins' rooms.

The house to be burglarized stood apart from other houses, giving the burglar access to several points of entrance. Nevins chose to remove a pane of glass, since he believed he could do so making only a minimum noise. He succeeded in making the removal and, putting in his arm, unlocked the window, raised it stealthily and passed through it into the kitchen.

So far so good. It was to be supposed that the dining room was near the kitchen, and if he could reach the former doubtless he could find a fork or spoon which he could take away with him to prove that he had won the bet. For it had been agreed that he must secure some article of silver or value not to be found in the kitchen.

Billy rushed an electric lamp he had with him and thereby made his way into the dining room. By the same light he found a sideboard. Opening a drawer, he came upon a few silver forks and spoons that had not been put away for the night. He selected a fork, and the moment he put his hand on it a thrill of pleasure shot through him at what he considered a sure prospect of getting safely away with it and winning his bet.

But suddenly another thrill of a different kind shot through him. The room in which he stood was instantaneously illuminated. He stood, not knowing what was to happen next, but fearing to be dropped by a bullet. Not a sound broke the stillness. There was some thing terrible in the uncertainty, and the uncertainty was of long duration. Billy neither saw nor heard any one for more than a minute by the watch. But he did not need a watch, for the thumping of his heart sufficed.

What was taking place near the button in the hall where the electric lights had been turned on? The door of the dining room by which Billy had entered stood ajar, and through the opening between the hinges a girl stood peering at the burglar. Careful as he had been he had made sufficient sound for her to hear since she was lying awake. She got out of bed, thrust her feet into a pair of slippers, put on a wrapper and stole downstairs. Hearing something stirring in the dining room, she went to the door and, perceiving that she could look into the room through the crack, took the pre-

TO SUCCEED IN BUSINESS.

Find Out Whether You Are a Promoter or a Caretaker.

In the American Magazine a writer says:

"All the world of men is divided into two classes—caretakers and promoters. The most important decision a man can make in his business life is to determine in which one of these two classes he belongs."

"Really I have come to believe that at least half of the sorrow and failure and heartache in the business world comes simply because men won't recognize that law. Square pegs in round holes—what are they? Just promoters in caretakers' jobs, that's all, or vice versa. Brilliant subordinates who fail utterly in business on their own account? Simple enough. They are caretakers—spendthrifts, efficient, successful ideas that they are meant to be something else. A great big business suddenly begins to stagger and fall apart, and everybody wonders why. But apply the same law and it's easy—too many promoters or too many caretakers, not the proper working mixture of each."

"Alexander was a promoter of the first order. He conquered the world. But where were the caretakers to conserve and consolidate and solidify? They just weren't, that's all, and Alexander's empire fell to pieces almost before his ashes were cold. A few hundred years later Caesar conquered the world, and his empire stood for generations. Why? Because Augustus, one of the great caretakers of history, followed Caesar."

WARNING THE JAPANESE.

Famous Oriental Scholar Speaks to His Countrymen.

A warning against the spread of pro-German sentiment among the Japanese people has been uttered by Dr. Inazo Nitobe, a famous scholar. Through the columns of a popular business organ he has declared that two dangers confront his people during the present war. The first is the pro-German illusion and the second the tendency to luxurious living.

He said: "Though Japan is one of the belligerents, we did only a little fighting at the outset of the war, and for the rest we did nothing but make gain. We realized unexpected profits through war trade. Some Japanese make no hesitation in offering unstinted tribute of admiration at the German altar."

"This is no time for the Japanese to indulge in lauding the Germans and disparaging the Entente peoples. If Germany should win victory in this war and control Europe, it would be an appalling calamity for all the states of the Orient. If the Japanese were so much bewitched by the splendid German organization as to adore other objectionable German qualities, such as disregard of justice, humanity, and international treaties, it would be a most deplorable misfortune for the nation."

"If the German ambitions should be realized, Japan herself, unless she were conquered by Germany, would have to become ultra-military, and sacrifice all other aims of civilization at the altar of accumulation of warlike weapons and military preparedness. With a country like Germany roaming about at large in the world there could never be a guarantee of peace without powerful military strength."

Dr. Nitobe condemns the extravagance of those who have become rich through the war and says they are exercising a degenerating influence on the morality of the masses of the people.

Guard the Railways.

Beyond all things the present war has been a railway war. Not only have vast armies had to be munitioned and supplied on a scale hitherto undreamed of, but vast bodies of men have had to be transported to different parts of the same battle front or to another theatre of operations safely and expeditiously. Not only have existing systems to be maintained in the best of operating conditions but new lines have had to be built for strategic reasons, while temporary narrow-gauge roads have been laid in large numbers for the distribution of supplies, the transport of munitions to the trenches, and in the building of various forms of defensive work.

Even at some distant point from the front the work of a single explosive mine or bomb might impair the forwarding of fresh troops or needed supplies and prove disastrous beyond measure. Consequently to-day in Europe at least half a million soldiers are engaged solely in protecting railway tracks, so that there is an average of about five men for each mile.

Scattered among the railway employees in Europe are spies and detectives, working to frustrate any plot to damage the right-of-way or its structures, or to cause trains to run late. Such protection naturally has suggested in this country a corresponding field of action for home-defense leagues. From "Railway Transportation in War," by Herbert T. Wade, in the American Review of Reviews.

Making Progress.

"Don't you sometimes have to reprove your boy Josh?"

"Not any more," replied Farmer Cornsow. "To tell you the truth, he's got me sort of apologetic to him for the crude manner in which I was brought up."

Reason's whole pleasure lies in these words. Health, peace and competence.

sound save the almost inaudible scratching of Madison's pen. Upon Mrs. Thornton's face was a happy, radiant smile. Helena's was impassive, but in the dark eyes lurked a puzzled light. The two Holmeses sat awkwardly, still upon the edges of their chairs, gazing at their son across the room incredulously, as though they still could not believe, and occasionally Mrs. Holmes wiped her eyes.

Madison's pen moved on. "Pay to the order of Miss Helena Vail the sum of $10,000." He carefully inscribed the amount in numerals in the lower left hand corner.

"I can give this, and I give it with great joy in my heart."

"Honest," he confided to himself as he signed the check, "I feel so philanthropic I could almost make myself believe I had this money in the bank."

He tore the check from its stub and, standing up, handed it to Helena.

"I am not a rich man, Miss Vail, as I mentioned," he said, with a grave smile, "but I can give this, and I give it with great joy in my heart."

Helena took the check, glanced at it, smiled a little, lifted her eyes, an instant's mocking glint in them, and handed them quickly with her long lashes.

"No," Madison's hand, palm up, went out protestingly—"no, do not thank me; it is little enough."

He sat down again, drew the Patriarch's blank book toward him and, on the line beneath the one where the Patriarch had ended his essay with the words, "Such is the power of faith," wrote his name and set down the amount of his contribution.

"Ten thousand dollars!" It was Mrs. Thornton speaking as she took the check from Helena. She turned quickly to her husband. "Robert, have you your check book here?"

Thornton shook his head.

"No, dear," he said. "I'm afraid I haven't."

"Well, it doesn't matter," said Mrs. Thornton brightly. "You can use one of Mr. Madison's checks and write the name of your own bank on it—you've often done that, you know."

"A suggestion," Madison murmured to himself, "for which I thank you, Mrs. Thornton. It sounds so much less crude coming from you than from me."

But aloud he said courteously, "Take my pen, Mr. Thornton."

"Thank you," from the other as Madison placed it in his hand.

Mrs. Thornton and her husband had their heads together now and were whispering, Thornton with his eyes on Helena, who sat with lowered head twisting Madison's check in her hands. Then Thornton drew the check book toward him, scratched out the printed name of the bank it bore, wrote in another and went on filling out the check.

"Bony-meeny-miny-mo," said Madison to himself. "The suspense is awful. How much does he raise the rate? Next to the miracle, this is the first real thrill I've had. I feel like an elevator starting down quick."

As Madison had done, Thornton tore out the check and handed it to Helena. Helena stared at it, lifted her eyes to Thornton, flushed and looked down at the check again.

"Fifty thousand!" she murmured breathless.

"Splendid!" cried Madison, enthusiastically, rising from his chair and making a newly established record of congratulations toward Thornton.

"Splendid!" There's sixty of the five hundred and already. Splendid!"

Young ones ran toward his parents.

"I was alive, too, dad," he whispered, "to give too."

"Reckon so, an' I was a-got to be added to his hand went into his pocket."

There was a little exclamation from Helena, and she moved a step forward.

as though to interpose. Madison looked at her quickly and quietly stepped around the table, placing himself between her and Holmes; then, facing Holmes, he leaned over the table from the far side toward the other.

"It's not the amount, Holmes," he said kindly. "In the broad, true sense the amount counts for nothing. All cannot give the same."

"Yes," assented Holmes. "Reckon that's the way I feel." He counted the bills in his hand and dropped them into the little japanned box, then scrawled his name in the book beneath Thornton's, adding the amount—$8.

Madison looked around the group benignantly.

"I think they should know our theory what we have done." He pointed toward the lawn. "Let us go and tell them, not in any set speech, but just simply, each of us speaking to a few. The few will tell others. Shall we go?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Thornton—"yes, let us tell them." She turned to Helena and kissed her. "Try and come over to see me, dear. We shall be here now for a little while at least. Is it asking too much? Robert will bring you back and forth from the village. And perhaps, if I may, I will come out here to see you. May I?"

"I shall be very glad to do as my wife suggests," said Thornton, holding out his hand. "You will come, Miss Vail?"

"You are very good—both of you," Helena answered simply. She raised her eyes to Thornton. Her hand was still in his. "Yes, I will try to come."

"Oh, break away!" muttered Madison impatiently, but inwardly. He stepped to the door and opened it. "Will you lead the way, Mrs. Thornton?" he said calmly, standing aside.

Thornton and his wife passed out, and the Holmeses, with clumsy, earnest words upon their lips to Helena, followed. Madison hung back, then stepped quickly to Helena.

"Tear up that check of mine so small you can't find the pieces, Helena," he said hurriedly, "and send Thornton's right off to any old bank you like in New York. Indorse it and write them a note saying you wish to open an account. Inclose your signature and tell them to mail back the bank book, a check book, deposit slips, and all that. They'll know by the newspapers that Thornton's subscribed fifty thousand before they get the check, and they'll feel honored to be your depository. Do it tonight. Understand?"

"Yes," and Helena nodded her head. "I'll see to it, all right." Then, a little perturbed, "But those poor Holmeses and their $8, Doc, I—"

"Now, don't be greedy, Helena," rejoined Madison cheerfully. "You mustn't expect everybody to hand out ten and fifty thousand just because Thornton and I did. Try and appreciate the little things of life, too."

"Oh," exclaimed Helena angrily. "Doc Madison, I'd like to—"

"Yes, all right, of course," he interrupted, grinning. "Goodbye! That's all. I'm off—see, they're waiting for me!" And leaving Helena with an outraged little flush upon her cheeks he hurried through the door after the others.

CHAPTER XII.

Knotting the Strings.

It is an old saying that some have greatness thrust upon them. True of men, it is, in one instance at least, true of places. Needley, from an unheard of, modest, innocuous and unassuming little hamlet, leaped in a flash into the focus of the world's eyes.

In huge headlines the papers in every city of every state carried it on their front pages, and while the first astounding dispatch from the metropolitan newspaper man was being copied by leading dailies everywhere there came on top of it, clinching its veracity beyond possibility of doubt, the news that Robert Thornton, the well known Chicago multimillionaire, had given $50,000 to the cause.

A man, much less a multimillionaire, doesn't give $50,000 for a bubble, so the managing editors of the leading dailies rushed for their star reporters—and the star reporters rushed for Needley—and the red haired, sorrowful faced man in the Needley station grew haggard, tottered on the verge of collapse and, between the sheaves of flimsy that the reporters fought for the opportunity of pushing at him, wired desperately for a relief.

Needley awoke and came to life—as from the dead. There were bustle, activity and suppressed and unsuppressed excitement on every hand. The Waldorf hotel once more opened its doors; the Congress hotel was already full.

The reporters interviewed everybody with but one exception—the Patriarch. They interviewed Madison, and Madison talked to them gravely, quietly, a little self-deprecatingly, somewhat abashed at the thought of personal exploitation.

They interviewed Thornton, and Thornton, too, talked to them, but the very presence of Mrs. Thornton was weightier far than words.

They interviewed Needley, individually and collectively, and they interviewed Helena, but they did not interview the Patriarch. Here Helena barred their way. They were free to enter the cottage, to copy the names, the record of gifts inscribed in the book—already a long list, for Needley had required no other incentive to give than the example that had been set, but that was all.

Quietly, with demure simplicity, Helena, prompted by Madison, like a priestess who guards some holy inner shrine, told them that sensational notoriety had no place there—and the notoriety for that very cause became the greater. Not that they were denied a sight of the Patriarch's venerable and saintly form—they were permitted to catch glimpses of him on the beach, on the lawn, walking with bowed head in meditation, a figure whose simple majesty inspired words and columns of glowing tribute, but from personal contact Helena and the Flopper, always in attendance, warding them off, retreating always to the privacy of the cottage and its inner rooms.

All this had taken days, and now on the fifth day there came to Needley the vanguard of those who sought this new healing power—just a few of them, two or three, like far, outlying skirmishers evidencing the presence of the army corps to follow. With the reporters, as far as Madison was concerned, it was simple enough. He had but to let them go their way, permit them to revel in the stories that were on every tongue, to let them view with their own eyes facts, while he, modestly and diffidently, full of quiet earnestness, effaced himself, never thrusting himself forward, talking to them only when they pressed him.

But the handling of the sufferers who would flock to Needley in response to a newspaper publicity and indorsement that had been beyond his wildest dreams was quite another matter. Madison viewed the first arrivals—brought in from the station on cot beds to the Waldorf hotel—and retired to his room in the Congress to wrestle with the niceties and minutiae of the problem.

"You see," said Madison to the tip of his cigar as he tilted back his chair and extended his legs full on the table edge—"you see, I believe in faith, all right, and that's no josh. But the trouble with faith is that it's about the scarcest article on earth, and I haven't got any more Floppers to lead the way."

MADOC, SEPTEMBER 30, 1917

To the Citizens of Madoc

We would like to call your attention to the fact that from the receipts of the Red Cross Bazaar last year the Madoc Women's Patriotic League were able to send to the Red Cross Society cash and socks to the value of $515. Do you think the Red Cross and the C.N.C.A. have any reason to expect a continuation of these supplies this winter, or do you think some other Society in Madoc or Belleville or elsewhere will assume this amount for us? Now you can easily see the responsibility resting just now on the officers and executive of the M. W. P. League and they ask you once again in this year 1917 to give them your hearty support and help to send to the Canadian boys overseas, through the Red Cross, their honest share in our prosperity. Mrs. E. Bristol, President; Mrs. Eagleson, Treasurer; Mrs. W. Cross, Secretary.

A number of our citizens attended the Picton Fair on Wednesday.

Harvest Thanksgiving services will be held on Sunday next, Sept. 23rd, at 2.30 p.m., at Crookston, Rev. A. E. Smyg, officiating.

The sum of $17.04 in coppers were realized at the Copper Tea on Tuesday, for which the League wish to express their thanks.

The members of Oakdale Rebekah Lodge are all requested to be present on Friday evening to hear Mrs. Watson give her report of the Rebekah Assembly, which was held in Toronto.

Mr. Roy Tumelty, of Toronto, had the misfortune, while putting in wires in an attic, to fall through to the next floor, injuring him quite severely. On Saturday night he arrived home to recuperate.

In Hazard's church on Tuesday, Sept. 25, at 7.30 p.m., Rev. I. C. Wickware, of Cloyne, will deliver his famous Missionary Lecture, based upon his many years' in Africa as a Missionary. A silver offering will be taken to assist the great Missionary cause. Everyone cordially invited.

Madoc Fair will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 2nd and 3rd. A prize list and a program of events can be had by dropping a post card to W. J. Hill, Madoc. Among the prizes to be competed for will be found one for which you can enter an exhibit. Were each one to do so our Fair would in time become the greatest in the rural districts in Ontario. Will you help to do so? Have you enough local pride to do so?

Obituary

Mrs. S. J. Walker, only sister of Thos. Campbell, Queensboro, died in the General Hospital, Kingston, on September 28th, at the age of 68 years. She was well known in Madoc, having been born there and spent her early years in that village and for the last thirty years has been a resident here, respected by all who knew her. She was patient and cheerful through all her suffering and her end was calm and peaceful.

Coe Hill Fair

The Coe Hill Fair will this year be held next Thursday, September 27th. Many of the citizens of Madoc and surrounding district visit this annual event and invariably report a good time. The management announce that this year the Fair will surpass all its predecessors. This year farmers have been blessed with abundant crops and remunerative prices such as they have never before realized. Show your appreciation by helping the Coe Hill Fair management by your attendance next Thursday and the sending of exhibits.

Silver Cup to Rural Schools

The teachers and pupils of the rural schools of North Hastings are expected to do their "bit" towards making the Madoc Fair a success. J. R. Cook, M. L.A., by the presentation of a beautiful silver cup, to be competed for by the rural schools of North Hastings, has created a duty for the pupils and teachers of these schools which we trust they will not fail to perform. In order to give all the schools an opportunity of winning the cup Madoc Public School is debarred from competing. Full information as to the terms of the contest will be found on page 23 of the Prize List and are as follows:—For exhibition of marching, drill and neatness between rural schools of North Hastings. School winning the prize, a silver cup, for 3 years becomes owner. School winning the prize becomes custodian till next yearly competition until final award is made. Applications to be sent to Secretary, W. J. Hill, who will forward complimentary tickets for admittance of each pupil.

Madoc Fair Prize List

The following is taken from the Belleville Ontario and shows what our contemporary thinks of our Prize List: "The Ontario has received a copy of the Madoc Fair Prize List. The list is a respectable sized book of 83 pages and presents prize-offerings that are very elaborate in classification and generous in amount. In addition to the regular classes there are no less than 94 special prizes contributed by various donors to the Fair. Large purses are also offered for speeding contests. Thos. H. Thompson is the President and Will J. Hill, Secretary. This year's Exhibition will be held on October 2nd and 3rd.

Deputation Went to Ottawa

Belleville Ontario:—An influential deputation went to Ottawa Monday from Belleville and county to petition the Government for more generous consideration of the mining interests of this district.

Among those in the deputation were Peter MacLaren, Warden of Hastings County; T. H. Thompson, Reeve of Madoc; R. P. Coulter, Reeve of Stirling; Dr. Embury, Reeve of Bancroft; Simeon Fox, Reeve of Madoc Township; Robert Cook, M.P.P.; Chas. Ross, of Madoc; His Honor Judge Wills and Judge E. B. Fraleek.

It appears that some of the Government publications are so antiquated that grave injustice is being done to the mining interests of this district. It is to secure a rectification of the departmental reports and data and to secure other considerations that the deputation is making its visit.

Card of Thanks

ANARCHY'S APOSTLES

TWO NOTED LEADERS ARE NOW IN PRISON.

Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman Seen to Thrive on Unpopularity With the Legal Powers—They Are Opposed to Organized Society and Fight Bitterly Against All Forms of Authority.

It is no new experience for Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman to languish in jail, and apparently not particularly distasteful to them. What would be insupportable would be to be sent to jail privately, without any newspaper comment, without their friends being given a chance to bail them as martyrs. At present they are serving long terms for using their influence to defeat the operations of the selective draft law. It has been half jocularly suggested that it was rather a mistake to arrest them, since they thrive on imprisonment, and if left at large it would have been much easier for the New York police to round up the other pro-Germans, anarchists, and pacifists who are always to be found in their company. Deprived of their natural leaders, the others may continue to work underground, and thus be more difficult to capture.

Emma Goldman is a Russian Jewess and was born in 1869. At the age of 17 she was a full-fledged anarchist, and arrived in the United States ready to preach the doctrine she had learned from the Nihilists. For awhile she worked in factories; then she got married and was unhappy, but the natural ecstasy of her husband is taken for granted. She concluded that marriage is a failure at present limited, and since then she has formed occasional unconventional alliances. In 1893 she incited a riot in New York, and as a result spent a year in jail. This did not cure her, for on her release she resumed her anarchist preachings, though with more cunning. At the time of the assassination of President McKinley she was again arrested on suspicion of having incited Czolgosz, who was a friend of hers, but was acquitted. Her life has been a strenuous one, and she is probably the most thoroughly detested woman in the United States. For a considerable time she found it expedient to pass as "Miss Smith" because of her difficulty in getting lodgings.

Berkman is her favorite pupil. He attained nation-wide notoriety when he made an attempt to murder H. C. Frick, of Pittsburgh. Early broodings over capitalism and the injustice of all existing forms of government are said to have driven him to the deed which earned for him a prison sentence of 22 years. He served only 14 years. Like Emma Goldman, imprisonment did not daunt his fiery spirit, and on his release he immediately took up his work where it had been broken off and began the publishing of a revolutionary labor paper. Miss Goldman, too, by the way, is a publisher. Since then Berkman has been several times under arrest, but has not been sentenced, though several of his dupes have served time because they endeavored to put his ideas into practice. He has been associated with the I. W. W., and indeed he and Miss Goldman have found the scheme of becoming patrons of new forms of violence, in cases which interest them only because of the opportunities for violence that they present, to be a better means of achieving notoriety than steadily preaching their old doctrine of anarchy.

The creed of Goldman and Berkman has been frequently declared in their writings. As to government, they believe that there ought to be no Government at all. They contend that it has only succeeded in protecting property and monopoly, and as they declare that all property ought to be in common, and nobody have any private rights to it, they insist that government "is a huge failure, and the cause of many of the troubles of the world. They maintain that soldiers are merely professional man-killers, who are worse than ordinary murderers, since the murderer kills either for some advantage to himself or in a fit of anger. In the course of their speeches against the draft they said over and over again, "I believe that militarism will cease when the liberty-loving spirits of the world say to their masters: 'Go and do your own killing. We have sacrificed ourselves and our loved ones long enough fighting your battles. In return you have made parasites and criminals of us in time of peace and brutalized us in time of war. You have separated us from our brothers and have made the world a human slaughter-house. No, we will not do your killing or fight for the country you have stolen from us.'"

They believe in free speech, that is to say, that everyone shall have the right to say or print exactly what he thinks, without any restriction whatever. If any harm should result from this freedom, it will be counteracted by more free speech. All forms of religion they hold to be superstition, and all churches stumbling-blocks to human progress. They believe in free love, free motherhood. The most pernicious part of the doctrine is that they have a right to impose their beliefs upon people who dissent from them by means of bombs. No one can object to them holding any theories that they please upon any subject. They are regarded as menaces to human society because they advocate the use of murder and arson to establish a reign of anarchy.

It is estimated that over two hundred thousand pounds weight of paper are used in this country year for the manufacture of cigarettes.

Roumanian Courtesy.

The Roumanians are among the handsomest races in Europe, but that, says a correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, is only a part of their fascination. Some enthusiasts have said that the ladies of Bukarest "combine the beauty of the Hungarian, the grace of the Austrian, the wit and style of the Parisian." But still we have not all the truth. It is the distinction and kindness of the manners of Bukarest which mark it out among the cities of the world. No one ever found there anything but courtesy. Many have pronounced the people the politest on earth, and the politeness is not a matter of civility or readiness to oblige, but a high-bred distinction of manner.

The cinchona-tree, from which quinine is obtained, grows at an elevation of seven thousand to ten thousand feet in the Andes.

GREAT PIRATE PROBLEM

SERIOUS FIGURES OF GERMANY'S SUBMARINE EFFORT.

Editor of The Scientific American Believes That the Allies Will Have to Destroy Three U-Boats Daily in Order to Defeat Desperate and Fierocious Campaign of the Huns.

IF Germany concentrates her whole manufacturing energy on submarines, how many can she turn out in a year? It is the editorial opinion of The Scientific American that the number is in excess of one thousand, and it bases its belief on the existence of German yards having a capacity of over 500 submarines at once and on an estimate of six months as the average time of construction. In this possibility the editor sees "the immediate danger-point" of the great conflict into which the Allies are engaged. It is obviously necessary to see that Germany's submarines are destroyed faster than she can build them, or at the rate of, say, three a day. It is impossible to say how many have been already destroyed, but The Scientific American is inclined to think that the mortality among them is by no means as great as had been represented. Says the editor:

"It is only recently that this journal has been able to obtain a conservative estimate, in quarters where reliable statistics are available; and we are informed that a total loss of one hundred would be, if anything, an overstatement of the truth. This
were supposed to be lost because they were believed to have been heavily hit by shell-fire.

"For some months we have had a growing conviction, based upon a very close study of the campaign, that the submarine losses were not nearly so large as represented, and that with the growth in size, speed, and sea-keeping qualities of the submarine, the problem of meeting and breaking up the so-called blockade is becoming increasingly difficult. . . .

"Of course, the only plan by which Germany could build a thousand submarines in a year would be by what has come to be known as the manufacturing method, of which a notable example is found in the great Ford plant at Detroit. It is pretty safe to say that she has adopted a standard type of craft, the details of which are based upon the experience of the past two and a half years, and that she has enlisted the whole of her ship-building plants, public and private, and a corresponding number of her engine-building firms, in this work.

"We have made investigation of the capacity of the German yards as regards building ways, and it dis-closes the interesting fact that, without laying down any additional ways, she could have under construction at any given time about 530 submarines of the size of the U-53 which came to Newport last year. The 800-ton submarine requires about 30 feet of clear width in order to allow a working space around the hull, and its length is something under 250 feet. Each of the three 625-foot drydocks at Wilhelmshaven, for instance, would permit of the construction of six submarines on its floor, and eight boats could be constructed in each of the larger docks, 822 feet in length. Also the floating docks, of which the Germans have so many,
would form excellent building ways.
The smaller drydocks, 500 feet or less in length, and the floating docks would take two, three, or four submarines, as the case might be. Moreover, ways suitable for submarine construction can be built rapidly on the foreshore or river and dockyard capacity, so far as building ways is concerned, could quickly be doubled. If the Germans thought fit, they could have a thousand submarines under construction at the same time. . . .

"The Central Powers may have two hundred submarines afloat (and we think it more than that), and if, as more than likely, they have some five hundred on the ways at the present time, this would mean that in six months they would have seven hundred U-boats available, and twelve hundred by next spring.

"But the greatest danger to the German personnel numbers over 150, 000 men. Her idle battleships can supply all the men required to man the submarines as they are successively set afloat.

"Here, as we see it, is the immediate danger-point in the great conflict. It is here that the United States should apply, and should at once apply, their whole effort."

Celtic Japanese.

The Ainu, the Celtic race of Japan, live in the Island of Yeddo, although the race has become so reduced that there are now not more than 16,000 or 17,000 of them left in the country. The most noticeable peculiarity about Ainu women is that they have tattooed upon their upper and lower lips what resembles a moustache. The women are not considered attractive, and their matrimonial prospects are quite injured without this decoration. The moustache is begun when the girl is quite a child. It is done gradually, a little each year, until it extends partly across the cheek, the material used being the soot from burning birch bark. The face is out and the black rubbed in. Afterwards it is washed in a solution of ash bark liquor to fix the color. The Ainu women are usually finely formed, straight and well developed, with small hands and feet. The eyes are beautiful soft brown, their hair black and most luxuriant, and their complexion olive, with often a deep rich color in their cheeks. The native cloth of which their garments are made is woven from the fibre of the bark of the ash tree.

BEST OF ALL ASSETS.

Character It Is That Wins the Great Battles of Life.

"God Almighty hates a quitter," said Tom Reed of Maine. The nation roared applause from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the lakes to the gulf for the virile vigor of this rough expression of manhood. The sentiment is one of perennial value.

But what makes the man who does not know when he is defeated and lights to the finish, be the finish his or his opponent's? Is it not character, and is not character at bottom only the moral equivalent of stalwart backbone?

The quitter fails, and fails because he lacks the force of character, the strength of will, which sees possibilities beyond capacities and regards obstacles as opportunities, discourages as incentives. The fight which is worth attempting at all is the fight which deserves to be fought through.
"It's dogged as does it," as when Heenan said to Sayers, "Now, Tummy, lad, 'tis thou or I," and he won the last round and the match.

There was character. It may not have been ideal character. It certainly was not character in its highest expression. But it was the sum of the man's whole personality. All the power of him, all the pith and punch of invincible determination, went into the winning of his fight. The bulldog shows the same strength of will when he lets himself be choked or cut to pieces rather than let go his grip on the other dog's jugular.

It is this readiness to be killed, if need be, if one cannot best one's adversary, which wins the battle of life for men and the wars of nations for their existence. Such a readiness is a form of character and the product, whether aware or unaware, of a fight to achieve character. It is the reaction of the spirit to the long working of life and circumstances upon the raw and plastic ore of human nature.

Make money, then, and do so honorably. Get understanding for the sake of social service as well as your own growth. Win power over men through right methods of approach and appeal.
But with all your getting and giving achieve character above all.

Nothing can take the place of character. It knows of no substitute.
Cleverness, cunning and shrewdness are paper money. Character is the gold which alone gives them value.
collateral as security for loans and credit. Character is the best of all assets.—Spokane Spokesman-Review.

Hints to Milliners.

"No successful milliner can work alone," says a milliner in the American Magazine. "If she does her hats will come to have a sameness year after year that will lose her patrons. If she cannot go to Paris she must visit shops, such as mine is at present, and see as many smart people as possible.
This is a fact generally recognized by all good shops. Those in the middle west and far west who cannot send their representatives abroad send them to New York instead, and the smaller milliner who cannot afford even this must keep up with the smartest people in her own town and the nearest large cities and even supplement this by the smart trade magazines."

Grow Rhubarb in Your Cellar.

To cultivate a fine specimen of rhubarb you do not need any garden at all, but just a corner of a cellar and an old barrel or deep box.

Bore a dozen holes in the sides of your barrel for ventilation and a few in the bottom for drainage. Then place in it a layer of cinders about two inches deep and cover this with ordinary garden soil. Now, plant your rhubarb side by side, and cover them with another layer of earth.

Water them occasionally and keep the top of the barrel covered with a piece of carpet.

"Is It Safe?"

The Great Western railway, as part of its "safety" movement for the prevention of accidents to its employees, has issued a token which it is hoped will remind railway servants to think before taking action. The token, which is of brass and the size of a penny, bears the words, "In every action ask yourself, 'Is it safe?' This will disclose unseen dangers, inspire forethought, induce care and prevent accidents." On the reverse side of the token is the inscription, "A charm against accidents. 'Is it safe?'"—London Times.

ALL AROUND THE FARM

GROWING RED CLOVER.

Hay is Rich in Protein, Palatable and of High Feeding Value.

Red clover is the most important leguminous forage crop in what is known as the timothy-clover area, which includes New England, the middle Atlantic and the north central groups of states. It is also important in certain sections of the great northwest and in the northern part of the south central states. Where it does well it may be considered as the basis of permanent systems of agriculture.

Red clover grows well on a variety of soils, but is best adapted to deep.

Experiments have shown that the removal of the hay crop does not destroy the value of the clover as a green manure crop. From 30 to 50 per cent of its fertilizer value is probably left in the roots and stubble which can be plowed under. Picture shows turning under red clover for green manure.

well drained clay loams and to limestone areas. On sandy soils it is productive when well supplied with humus. In general it will not thrive on ill drained land or on sour or acid soils.
The customary way of seeding red clover is to sow it in the spring on winter grain, which acts as a nurse crop.
This is a cheap and convenient method, but it is often unsuccessful on soils which are low in humus content. In that case the surface of the ground is likely to dry out quickly after the grain has been removed, and as a result the clover perishes.

It is best to sow the clover seed in winter grain very early in spring. The small seed disk drill is coming into favor for this purpose and should be used as soon as it is dry enough to keep the machine from clogging.

Another method of treating red clover is to sow it in the late summer or early fall on a thoroughly prepared seed bed. This, however, is not practicable in the more northern portion of the clover belt. A seed bed should be finely pulverized, thoroughly compact and comparatively free from obnoxious weeds. The seeding should be at the rate of ten to twelve pounds per acre of clover alone or of six to eight pounds when seeded with timothy. On heavy soils the seed should not be placed over one-half inch deep and on light soils not over one inch.

Red clover makes a splendid pasture, but there is danger that cattle and sheep which are turned upon it in early spring or following heavy dew may boast. The practice of including a good part of timothy or blue grass in red

TWO LONG YEARS HE SUFFERED

"Fruit-a-lives" Made Him Feel
As if Walking On Air

ORILLIA, Ont., Nov. 25th, 1914.

"For over two years, I was troubled with Constipation, Drowsiness, Lack of Appetite and Headaches. One day I saw your sign which read 'Fruit-a-lives' make you feel like walking on air."
This appealed to me, so I decided to try a box. In a very short time, I began to feel better, and now I feel fine.
I have a good appetite, I eat, and I feel entirely. I recommend this pleasant fruit medicine to all my friends."

clover pastures practically eliminates this danger. When intended for hay red clover should be cut as soon as it is in full bloom. When the stalks have thoroughly wilted and before the leaves have become dry and brittle the hay should be raked into windrows for curing. These should be put into cocks, which will turn water to some extent, and left there until sufficiently cured for hauling. Exposure to bad weather darkens the hay to considerable depth in the stacks and seriously reduces its feeding value. For this reason it also pays to store clover hay under cover. The hay itself is rich in protein, palatable and of high feeding value.

A South American Doll.

A pretty quaint description of a South-American girl and her doll is given in a book, "The Purple Land," by W. H. Hudson. It was during his wanderings near Monte Video that he came across a tiny native, and he said to her—

"And what do you do all day long—talk and play?"
"I talk to my doll; I take it on the pony when I go with the sheep."
"Is your doll very pretty, Anita?"

"No answer."
"Will you let me see your doll, Anita? I know I shall like your doll because I like you!"

"She gave me an anxious look.
Evidently doll was a very precious being and had not met with proper appreciation. After a little nervous fidgeting she left me and crept out of the room; then presently she came back, apparently trying to screen something from the vulgar gaze in her scanty little dress. It was her wonderful doll—the dear companion of her rambles and rides.
With fear and trembling she allowed me to take it into my hands. It was, or consisted of, the fore-foot of a sheep cut off at the knee; on the top of the knee part a little wooden ball wrapped in a white rag represented the head, and it was dressed in a piece of red flannel—a satyr-like doll with one hairy leg and a cloven foot. I praised its pleasing countenance, its pretty gown and dainty boots, and all I said sounded very precious to Anita, filling her with emotions of the liveliest pleasure."

No Case.

The old miser in the story, who dropped a five-dollar gold piece in the plate at church, mistaking it for a nickel, could get no great satisfaction out of the deacon, as will be recalled, but he was not the man to give up easily.

Accordingly he sought legal advice with a view of instituting a suit at law.

But the lawyer whom he consulted was one of those rare and gifted souls who would rather be witty than rich, or almost anything else, for that matter.

"Sir," said he at once, "you have no case. You are guilty of contributory negligence."

Piles Cured By Dr. Chase's Ointment

It is a surprise to many to learn that there is any cure for piles short of a surgical operation. The doctors have encouraged this idea until the sufferer from this annoying ailment lives in constant dread of the surgeon's knife.

This letter from Mr. Campbell carries a message of good cheer to all sufferers from piles, because it tells how relief and cure can be obtained in the quiet of your own home by the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment.

Mr. Donald M. Campbell, Campbell's Mountain, N.S., writes: "I have used Dr. Chase's Ointment with great success for hemorrhoids, or piles, of fifteen years' standing. After trying all kinds of so-called pile cures, three boxes of Dr. Chase's Ointment gave me a complete cure. I have also used Dr.
Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, and there are no others so good. You may use this letter, if you wish, for the benefit of others who may suffer as I did." (Sworn before me, Murdoch Gordon Campbell, J.P., in the County, and for Inverness County.)

You are not experimenting when you use Dr. Chase's Ointment, for it has an unparalleled record of cures to back it up. Beware of imitations and treatments said to be "just as good." They only disappoint. 60c a box, all deal-

New York dictated these styles and they embody the most recent style touches that are being much worn in that fashion centre, and if you select your Autumn Wearables at RITCHIE'S then you are assured of novelty features and materials that are most dependable, at a moderate price.

SUITS

In the much wanted materials, such as Serges, Cheviots and Gabardines, showing the season's favorite shades of brown, burgundy, green, navy, black, etc. in styles that are most becoming, priced as low as $17.50 and as high as $67.50.

SEPARATE COATS

That illustrate correctly the swaggar effects to be obtained in the seven-eighths, and full length styles. Many strikingly attractive models are displayed priced from $15.00 to $60.00.

DRESSES

For Dresses much favor is bestowed on the ever popular Serge, but of course Silks come in for their just share of prominence, also pretty combination effects. Many pleasing models are shown and the prices range from $12.00 to $35.00.

BLOUSES

of crepe de chimes, georgette crepes, silks and lingerie effects, all shown in the season's most bewitching style tendencies with many stunning models awaiting your seeing.

The Formal Opening Days truly revealed the fact that our Millinery Artists were not stinting in their efforts to place on show the most attractive assemblages of Smart Hats that we have gathered together. Of course New York and other leading fashion centres have assisted to this end by sending scores of advanced models that created much favorable comment by the women who appreciate exclusiveness and bewitching style lines in every detail. There is a model here that was designed especially for you and our salesladies will welcome an opportunity to show it.

Suiting Dress Coat Fabrics in Abundance

All the season's favorite weaves and colors are displayed in our Dress Goods Section for your early seeing and choosing, with prices lower than you will find elsewhere.

Letters from Our Soldiers

Perth, Scotland, Aug. 22nd.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON.—I am posting to-day a small box which contains your son's hat badge. I was his Co. Sergt. Major and at present I am on 10 days' leave at home. This is the first opportunity I have had of posting it. I know Sergt. Barker has written you before so there is very little for me to say except to express my deepest sympathy and regret, but I knew your son well enough to know rather a hero's death than the life of a slacker.

Yours very sincerely,

R. MITCHELL, 6254, 24th Canadians.

Eastbourne, Eng., Sept. 2.

MR. FRANK SMITH, Madoc, Ont.

DEAR FRANK,—

Just a few lines to say I am quite well but still in hospital. This is a very beautiful place. I have never seen a prettier scene than down here at the seashore.

I have just come from church. We had it in one of the rooms of the hospital. I will soon return to Seaford, our "base." Came from the line after 9th April with shell shock, then took trench fever, came to England June 4th, was in a hospital in Nottingham one month and was in Epsom and Uxbridge Convalescent Hospitals two weeks, spent my sick furlough in Glasgow, had a ripping time. Hope that everything is o.k. with you and the lads.

Yours sincerely,

3rd C. C. D., Seaford, England, P.S.—What next will the "Fords" be doing.

Paris, France.

DEAR MOTHER AND ALL:—

Well mother, I suppose you will be pleased to hear that my leave came at last, but not any more than me.

Three of our sections came together and were very pleased as we have been able to go about together and see the sights. I am sending you a little book of the beautiful places we have seen. We have just come in from seeing the Eiffel tower and was away up past the Ferris wheel that you see in the background to the right. Also visited most of the towers to the left.

Yesterday we went to see Napoleon's tomb and met three English nurses there who went through the buildings with us. We also took a trip up the river Seine, which was elegant. We went in a boat similar to the one I have marked in the book, and that is one of the beautiful places I passed. London, Eng., can't be compared to this place, and Toronto is to it like Liskeard is to Toronto.

And talk about your pretty women, many here would almost daze a fellow's eyes.

We have still six days of our leave to put in, and will be here for the third anniversary of the war, which will likely be very interesting.

I am going to get my picture taken before I go back if I have any money left. Everything is so dear on account of the war a fellow's money doesn't last long.

Best love to all.

From your loving son and brother,

Roy.

France, 7-7-17

DEAR MOTHER AND ALL:—Just arrived back from Paris last night and received your four letters all together. I wrote you once while I was in Paris, but didn't get it posted so will send both together. We certainly had a fine time, but the weather was so bad I am not feeling well since I came back, may go to the hospital with trench fever. Frank has gone to England on leave, and Dug, expects to go to Paris soon. I am sending some of the views, and my chum and I had our picture taken and will get them in a few days.

Had a nice long letter from Beth's mother, two from Beth, and a big one from Ethel.

The snaps were fine, especially the one of Ombra and Carrie. It has been raining here for the past week and it rained nearly every day in Paris. We suppose you will be worrying considerably in not having heard from me quite a while, but I was in the trenches when my leave came, so did not have time to write. Will write again in a few days to make up for lost time. Wish love from your loving son and brother.

France

DEAR MOTHER AND ALL:—

Well mother, I think I told you in my last letter that I expected I would have to go to hospital for awhile. Well it has come true, and I am down for fever which many of our boys have had and is nothing to worry about.

Send all my mail to my old address and they will forward, as I will likely be back by the time I have an answer to this. It is a fine place, the hospital, being right on the sea shore, and the sea breezes are great. It will be a rest after being in the line so long.

Frank had gone on leave when I left so I expect he will soon be back. I hope the weather has changed since you wrote last, as it would certainly be bad for the haying.

Dug is going to send you the views of Paris for me, as I hadn't time to wrap them before I left. I haven't written to Beth since I left for Paris, so you see she was not first this time.

It is beginning to drift towards Autumn again and no sign of peace. I will soon have to send to father for a new pair of long boots for the winter, as it looks as though we will have to wade the mud again this winter. I will let him choose for himself this time and he can get a pair as long as he likes, the longer the better. If he could get me a coat just like a sheepskin, a short one I mean without the sheepskin lining, just a cloth lining. You see the cloth coats issued to us will not keep out the rain or wet snow and I think one like I mention would. No hurry, though, for no one can tell what will happen in the next two or three months.

Hope you have a real good harvest and make well out of it.

Best of love from your loving son and brother.

Roy.

The W. I. and Oleomargarine

One city "Women's Institute" has passed a resolution for oleomargarine in a meeting at which the usual statements were used to support the cause of the packing industry.

If the farm women wish to preserve the dairy industry of Ontario they will be well advised to pass resolutions in their "Women's Institutes" and bombard both Hon. Mr. Hanna and Hon. Mr. Burrell with them to no end.

The city agitation is now being renewed and the farming industry of the Dominion should raise a determined voice in its own interests, even though the Government appears to be lining up behind Sir Joseph Flavel and his associates in the packing industry.—Sun Editor.

Necessary Farm Equipment

MORE and more the Ford car is looked upon by progressive farmers as necessary farm equipment, the same as the plow, the hay-rake, the drill, the mower, the harrow and other labor and time-saving machinery.

A farmer with a Ford car can dispense with one or two of his horses and make the trips to town, railway station, creamery, or to the neighbours in one-third the time. In fact there is no farm machine made that will save the busy farmer and his busy wife so much valuable time as a Ford. And it's so easy to take care of—far easier than a horse. No bed to make, or hay and oats to get, no harnessing and unharnessing, and no stables to clean. The Ford practically takes care of itself.

Ask any farmer who owns a Ford if he would ever again try to get along without it. His answer will hasten your decision to own one.

News From The District...

Interesting Jottings from our own Correspondents and Collected from Exchanges for Review Readers.—All the happenings of the District.

Eldorado

Who said Eldorado had been dumped on the scrap heap? No chance! It is still very much alive and if you heard, Mr. Editor, the number of voices asking for Eldorado items you would be tempted to rouse your scribe with the promise of a worthy stipulated stipend. Well, since you heard from this burg last things have been moving some.

The stork has been busy again. He just placed a baby boy in the hands of Mr. and Mrs. F. Nickle and then a few days later he walked into the home of Mr. M. Vandervoort and left them a baby girl. It is quite a problem to the ordinary individual whose face wears the broadest and sweetest smile. Fred claims it for it's a soldier and Merton claims it because he has as many kinds as anyone. Congratulations to all concerned.

Wonder who those fellows are that stand around the church doors and misconduct themselves, not intentionally? Say, fellows, if you don't want to worship, be it known, those that do can do without your noise and laughter from without.

Quite a number took in Picton Fair. Among them were Mr. and Mrs. C. White and Miss Annie, Mr. J. Holmes.

Mrs. White, Dartford, is visiting her daughter, Mrs. H. Jones. Mr. Harry spent a day in Peterboro last week on business. Rumor has it that the burg is about to lose our good friend, his wife and family. Say, Harry, boy, don't forget you will be missed in more ways than one.

Glad to hear that Miss Lulu Wright is improving.

Mrs. E. Fox has the pleasure of several week-end visitors.

Dr. and Mrs. Gardiner and family are absent from home on a brief vacation. None need it more than our M. D. We trust they will all return improved by the change.

Rev. T. Wallace announced a memorial service in Fox's Methodist church next Sabbath at 2.30 p.m. for Pte. Jos. Krampe.

We are delighted to hear that Mr. Dave Jones is gaining.

The anniversary services at Union Methodist church on September 10th will not soon be forgotten. Rev. J. A. Connell, of Newcastle, a former pastor, preached morning and evening with great acceptability. He also spoke briefly at the rally service in the afternoon. Large crowds greeted him at every service. The church has undergone, internally and externally, a complete renovation at the hands of Mr. E. Seymour, Madoc. Everyone speaks highly of the artistic taste and quality of the work displayed. The financial objective of the Trustees was $250 and many were more than surprised when the pastor announced that the offering was over $250. Well done that, setting up a good stiff pace.

Cooper

Who said Cooper was dead? Not so, that burg still lives. A good many farmers are busy with their corn.

Jack Frost called on some of them a little too soon.

Mr. Geo. Smith and son have erected a fine silo and will have it ready for their corn.

Messrs. R. R. Hannah and F. A. Reynolds will load sheep and cattle this week.

Mr. Albert Graham has his new house completed and will be moving in a few days.

The hum of the threshing machine is heard again. Mr. Frank Parks is on the job again.

Mr. Sam Rollins is loading a car of lumber for Houston & Sons, Tweed.

Rally Sunday will be observed in Methodist church in the morning and Presbyterian church in the afternoon next Sunday.

Some of our young sports visited the Mohawk camp on Sunday last.

Miss Jennie Holmes, of Madoc, was under the parental roof over Sunday.

Mrs. J. Long has gone to L'Amable to visit at her home for a few days.

Mr. Tucker and Mr. Stephenson, of Madoc, are putting up the brick work for Mr. Stanley Rollins' new house.

Mr. Ed. Kerr, of Thomasburg, is doing the plastering.

Gunter

A number from Cashel attended the moving picture show at St. Oia last week and report a good time.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Dafeo and family visited his brother, Mr. R. Dafeo, on Sunday.

Cashel Sunday School held their rally on September 23rd and report it a grand success.

We are glad to see Mr. John Potter again on the milk wagon a few days.

Mr. Ezra Lockwood attended Frankford Fair.

A number from here attended Picton Fair.

Queensboro

Queensboro train service has changed time, the train going south leaving at 8.15 a.m. and returns at 9.30 p.m., goes direct to Kingston.

Mr. Allen Holmes and Miss Grace Moorcroft were married at the Methodist parsonage by Rev. Mr. Merrick on September 18th. Congratulations.

Mrs. T. H. Moore accompanied her daughter, Sadie, to Toronto. Sadie is attending Normal there.

The Hall was packed Monday night for the concert. While the pictures were not shown the crowd enjoyed Mr. Young's recitations immensely. Capt. Stewart enlightened the audience with his experience in the navy. They returned on Saturday night and played to the fullest house possible.

Mrs. (Dr.) Shaw, of Toronto, is visiting friends around here.

Mrs. W. J. Wiggins is at her brother's, Mr. John Gray. Glad to say he has had the splints removed from his broken leg and we hope soon to see him out again.

Mr. and Mrs. Leach, of St. Catharines, are visiting Mr. S. Cox.

Mr. James Rhodes, wife and mother, motored to Prince Edward last week, and Mrs. John Jolly, sister of Mrs. Ed. Rhodes, came back with them to visit.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Beckwith and family, of Bayside, spent Sunday with Mrs. J. I. Delyea.

Mr. and Mrs. H. Kells and Mr. and Mrs. F. David were in town Sunday.

We regret to report that Mrs. C. Thompson's father is not enjoying his usual health.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Rhodes, Mrs. Ed. Rhodes, Mrs. Jolly and Miss T. Akey were Sunday guests at the home of Mr. G. Gray.

Mrs. Reid is the guest of her sister-in-law, Mrs. A. Phillips.

Mr. A. Holmes is some better. His wife, however, is seriously ill.

Mrs. Hagerman is able to be around again.

Mrs. John Alexander is suffering a great deal these days.

The Ladies' Aid of the Methodist Church have added to the comforts of the church swing doors, new chairs and matting.

Sunday evening next will be Sunday School Rally at St. Andrew's church.

Miss Sadie Davis and Mrs. R. Davis visited at Mrs. Goldie Gray's on Friday last.

Saturday night frost spoiled all the garden stuff and flowers. It was sufficient to make ice 1 inch thick.

Misses Alice Howe, Minnie Green-Vera and Mary Squire, Madoc High School students from Madoc High School, spent the week-end at their homes.

Bannockburn

Who said Bannockburn was dead? Miss Ida Marshall spent Sunday at her home in Stirling.

Sunday, September 16th, now somewhat notorious by reason of the many cases of litigations that have arisen out of the services held on the Ivanhoe camp grounds, we visited that place and were much surprised at the great numbers present. To give the reader some idea of the multitudes in attendance we might say that the gentleman who took us there informed us that last year by actual count there were at one time 900 cars on the grounds and that this year there were many more, he putting the number at about 1100. The presence of so many people in a strictly rural district set us to analyzing the causes thereof. It could not be due to a great religious awakening because there are none such at present. To our mind it is due to a variety of causes such as the use of so many cars, good roads, fine weather, the expectation of originality in religious rites, to the extravagant statements and claims of Bishop Horner and his followers and to a growing habit of visiting the camp due to its being a fixed annual event. We are sorry to learn that too many visit the camp for other than the purposes for which the meetings are held. Though we were only a short time on the grounds yet we met at least one individual whose breath plainly indicated that he had been drinking something more intoxicating than water, and my companion said that he saw two young men drunk and heard them swearing. Every possible encouragement should be given to those who try, by every legitimate means, to put a stop to profanity in public places and to put an end to this carrying of liquor to either religious or other gatherings.

Tweed News: —Mr. Will J. Hill, the popular Secretary and Manager of Madoc's world famous Agricultural Exhibition, was in town Saturday bright and early with a big bundle of Fair literature for posting and distribution. We acknowledge the receipt of a complimentary ticket of admission and a warm-hearted welcome to be present at their show on October 3rd.

Would you believe it, the membership of Madoc Fair is less than 100. The people are too poor, too stingy or too lacking in local pride to support local institutions. Quit your meanness; pay your share of the upkeep of your own local institutions, play the game; be a man for a little while just to see what it feels like. All slackers are not war slackers. Boost your own town if it deserves it, if it doesn't make it worthy. Begin now, send $1 to W. J. Hill, Secretary, and get in return a membership ticket.

Mr. George Wright, as will be seen in this issue, is about to re-open his store at the old stand. Mr. Wright is putting in a new and complete up-to-date stock of fresh groceries. Of the 4 years that Mr. Wright has been away from his native burg, he spent 2 years travelling for the largest wholesale grocery firm in Canada, and thus acquired a knowledge of the business which will enable him to cater to the tastes of those who desire the latest and the best in that line. Mr. Wright's courtesy and obliging habits are such that we entitle him success in his chosen vocation.

Visit to Queensboro Pyrite Mine

Last Thursday Mr. G. H. Gillespie treated some of Madoc's citizens to an outing in his new Franklin car to the Queensboro pyrite mine. This property was originally owned by Judge Fraleek, of Belleville, and Steve Wellington, of Madoc. Later Will Cross, of this place, bought out Mr. Fraleek's interest and the company became known as the firm of Cross & Wellington, who sold to the present owners, the Canadian Sulphur Ore Co., of which Mr. G. Gillespie is Vice-President and Managing Director and Mr. H. Smeaton is Superintendent.

By the courtesy of the Vice-President and the Superintendent we were invited to explore the mine. The Rev. A. E. Smart and the Editor accepted the invitation and on being clothed in a miner's costume and decked with a headlight were taken by our guides down in the cage and by means of rope ladders and along loose minerals till we found ourselves in a stope over 400 feet beneath the surface. Here we saw men clothed somewhat like ourselves but much more efficient looking, and the thought forced itself upon our minds that every man is king in his own calling, and herein should be recognized that equality and brotherhood of man so frequently mentioned, so rarely exercised.

To the inexperienced eye there seemed to be an almost limitless amount of mineral here. Mr. Gillespie informed us that the total output of the mine to date is 80,000 tons and that its present daily output is 100 tons, which it was expected would in a short time be increased to 150. There are at present about 80 men employed.

The faith of the company in the permanency of this mine may be seen in the fact of their building a 2 1/2 mile railroad into the property and in the character of the buildings that they are erecting for their employees. The aim of the company is to erect commodious buildings for men who have families, who will thus be encouraged to take other workers as boarders so that in course of time all will enjoy the comforts of home life.

The building now being erected for the Superintendent, Mr. Smeaton, strikes the visitor, ignorant of the size of the plant and of the mineral development that is being done here, with some surprise. Mr. Fraser Aylsworth, one of our party, on being shown through the house, at once challenged Mr. Smeaton to swap homes. The superintendent's home is 29x42 with large, airy and well lighted rooms and is ideally situated facing the south and east.

CHANGING PATRIOTIC POEMS.

One Effect of New Friendships Among Nations.

War has had some odd effects on national poetry. Here in Canada we became so very humane in times of peace that we hesitated to sing the verse in the national anthem about "frustrating the envious tricks" of our enemies. Now we shout it quite lustily without a single qualm. Recently we have heard that the Americans may change one verse in "The Star-spangled Banner" so that it will not worry the British and Canadians. Quite lately some Americans suggested that the line in Longfellow's poem "Paul Revere's Ride," which reads,

If the British march by land or by sea,
Might be amended as follows:
If the enemy march by land or by sea.
It was considered that the alteration might please Canadians. However, it is not at all probable that many people in this country want the Americans to mutilate their literature and repudiate their history because the nations have become friends. In fact if any Briton or Canadian happens to be reading Longfellow's poem, he will doubtless be glad to think that these two Anglo-Saxon nations are not marching against one another. That would be our chief thought. We do not want Uncle Sam to give up his heroic literature in order to flatter us.

The English, by the way, are not making any haste to amend their own literature by cutting out of it the numerous hostile references to their present allies, the French. They have not cut this line out of Shakespeare's "King John"—

Go I to make the French lay down Their arms.

They may even continue to sing, as in Palgrave's "Creney,"

The legions of France are no more!
Even so recent an English poet as Sir Henry Newbolt has seen fit to tell how

The Frenchmen turned like a covey down
When the wind came sweeping from the West.

Scott's heroic poetry is largely a rhythmic anathema of England, telling as in "Flodden" how the "English hosts,"

Their King, their Lords, their mightiest low,
They melted from the field as snow;

but the English had their revenge in more than one chant against the Scotch, and the same songs are sung to-day on both sides of the border.

Do our expurgators fancy that in view of the joint operations of Russians and Englishmen in this war, these two lines will be expunged from "The Charge of the Light Brigade"—

Right through the line they broke;
Cossack and Russian Reeled from the sabre-stroke,
Shattered and sundered.

The literature of their wars against one another has truly helped Britons, Frenchmen, and Russians to fight the more valiantly, perhaps the more harmoniously, side by side now. We have no doubt that the unexpurgated "Ride of Paul Revere" inspired many men to fight with the British now.

War: A Sonnet.
The following sonnet was found scribbled on a sheet of paper among the effects returned to Canada of the late Major Miles Langstaff, the well-known young Toronto barrister, of the 75th Battalion, who was killed in action:

I never thought that strange, romantic War Would shape my life and plan my destiny:
Though in my childhood's dreams I've seen his car
And grisly steeds dash grimly thwart
The sky.
Yet now behold a vaster, mightier strife
Than echoed on the plains of sounding Troy.
Defeat and triumph, death, wounds,
laughter, life,
All mingled in a strange complex alloy.
I view the panorama in a trance
Of awe, yet colored with a secret joy,
For I have breathed in epic and romance Have lived the dreams that thrilled me as a boy!
How sound the ancient saying is, for sooth!
How weak is Fancy's gloss of Fate's steep truth!

Fats as Foods.

Man needs a varied diet, and in the main the classification most suited to ordinary understanding is fats, proteins, and carbohydrates. Many other things are essential in a fully-balanced diet if one would enjoy that state of existence known as being in good health. A proper amount of water, a more careful attention to the important factors. No one can live any length of time in good health if there is not in their diet a proper proportion of all these elements, and it is hard to say that one is more important than the other, so closely allied are they one to another, and for their full action depend so much on the action of each to the other in the body. Fat forms about 15 per cent. of the weight of the body, and is found in all its parts. It occurs in the largest masses just under the skin, but it is scattered in small amounts in all our tissues. In our food we get fat from the animal kingdom—meat, butter, milk, and eggs. From the vegetable kingdom we get it from the various oils, olives, cottonseed, peanuts, etc., certain cereals, and nuts. Some food which we eat is changed into fat by chemical action in the body. Food, sugar, and starch are so changed and are thus stored up in the body as reserve fat to be drawn upon if the fat is deficient in our diet.

Their Dreams Came True.
Catherine Breshkovskaya tells the story of when, as a girl, she was going up to St. Petersburg with her mother and sister. "A handsome young prince, returning from his official duties in Siberia," entered their compartment. For hours, she says, he discussed with her the problems of the Russian people. "His words thrilled like fire. Our excited voices rose steadily higher, until my mother begged us to speak low." The handsome young Prince was Peter Kropotkin. The years have passed, and the cause to which the two ardent young politicians in that Russian railway carriage devoted their lives has been vindicated. Madame Breshkovskaya, honored and free in her own country, is leading, exhorting, advising the forces of the revolution which she helped as now-

SEVEN YEARS TORTURE

Nothing Helped Him Until He Took "FRUIT-A-TIVES"

ALBERT VARNER
Buckingham, Que., May 3rd, 1915.

For seven years, I suffered terribly from Severe Headaches and Indigestion. I had belching gas from the stomach, bitter stuff would come up into my mouth after eating, while at times I had nausea and vomiting, and had chronic Constipation. I went to several doctors and wrote to a specialist in Boston but without benefit. I tried many remedies but nothing did me good. Finally, a friend advised "Fruit-a-tives". I took this grand fruit medicine and it made me well. I am grateful to "Fruit-a-tives", and to everyone who has miserable health with Constipation and Indigestion and Bad Stomach, "I say take "Fruit-a-tives", and you will get well."

erfully to make, and Prince Kropotkin, still in England, his refuge from the persecutions of autocracy, is forming a committee for the better instruction of the people of Great Britain concerning that practically unknown quantity which is new Russia. The Old World may well sit up, rub its eyes and stare, for dreams, in the Twentieth Century, have a way of coming true.

Best Soil For Beans.
For beans the soil should be rich and mellow. To get them tender at picking time they should have quick and continuous growth, and this is best assured when they are planted in a warm, rich, porous soil, well drained and given plenty of water. Well rotted manure, dug into the trench, is best when applied at this time of year, and the soil should be made fine with the shovel when digging and finished with the rake. Beans are planted in two general ways—in hills and in furrows or drills. Cleaner cultivation can be given by the hill system, but more can be grown in the same space of garden by the drill plan.

My Watcher

A Story of the Opening of the Great War.

By F. A. MITCHELL

I went abroad to travel for pleasure as soon as I had been graduated from college. I went to England, then over to France, and from there I went through Switzerland to Germany.

I was in Berlin in July, 1914, just before the breaking out of the great European war. I was walking one evening on that broad thoroughfare called Unter den Linden when I met a man whose eye I happened to catch. Until we had passed our eyes were fixed upon each other, why I could not divine. I presumed that he saw me looking at him, and he looked at me for that reason. Such things are quite liable to happen. There was nothing noticeable about the man except that he was very well dressed. As to his nationality, I did not know what it was; but, meeting him in Germany, I concluded that he was a German. From his lineaments he might have been of almost any of the white races that had their origin in a northern climate.

The same evening I went into a restaurant for dinner, gave my hat and cane to a waiter, and taking a seat at a table, scanned the menu. On raising my eyes from it I looked into those of the man I had met in the afternoon. He was regarding me with an expression which I could not exactly interpret. It might be expressed as ill at ease, but again it might have indicated cunning.

I still believed that it was a matter of happening, coincidence, whatever one may choose to call it, that was between us, and we had no more actual interest in each other than any other two men who happened to meet twice on the same day. Nevertheless during the dinner I occasionally cast a glance in his direction, and it always happened that he cast one at me at the same moment.

Intending to leave for America, I went the next morning to the American embassy to have my passport issued. As I was coming out whom should I see going in but the man I had twice met before. He started at seeing me and hurried on into the building. I went across the street and remained where I would not easily be seen waiting till he came out. When he did so he stood on the sidewalk looking up and down the street. I believed that he was looking for me. Presently he moved away. I mentioned these meetings to a German friend of mine. His theory was that the man was a spy in the employ of the government. "The city is full of them," he said, "and I fancy every stranger who comes here has a guardian assigned to him to watch him during his stay." This put a new idea into my head. I no longer considered our meetings accidental. I believed that I was being shadowed.

The next day the world was started by a declaration of war. I had intended to leave for home on that day and, being ready, boarded a train. It was the last or one of the last regular trains to leave Berlin. I stepped into a compartment and was placing my hand baggage on the rack when the door was darkened by some one entering. There was not light enough to make out who it was, but when we were both seated and the train pulled out of the station, with a better light, there was my watcher.

There was a change in him since I had last seen him. He was now clean shaven. Had not my attention been so thoroughly called to him I question if I should have recognised him as he now appeared.

I confess I was worried. I had esteemed myself lucky to get out of Berlin, but I now feared that this man would not permit me to leave Germany. Was I not in danger of being arrested and held for a spy? I remembered with anxiety some photographs of historic places that I had in my trunk and was not sure but that one of them took in distant Switzerland. If so, and this man was on my track, I might be taken off the train at any moment, detained in prison and possibly executed.

When we stopped at a station long enough to enable me to get something to eat I went to a lunch counter and while eating saw my watcher sitting at the other end of the counter. He looked aside at me at the very moment I looked at him.

After finishing my luncheon I went back to my compartment, expecting the man to return and resume his seat. But the guard shut the door, and the train started on without his having entered. Looking up into the rack where I had seen him place a satchel, his only hand baggage, I saw that it was not in its place.

I wondered what he was up to by this move. Had he left the train or only the compartment? Why had he ceased to keep me under his eye? I could not answer these questions. But I believed the move meant something to his advantage and to my disadvantage. I shuddered lest he had relinquished his watchfulness over me to turn it over to the soldiers.

As we approached the border my anxiety increased. I did not believe the man would permit me to get out of Germany. Why he had let me go so far I could not imagine. But I knew that the German police have their own way of doing things, and I supposed there was method in their madness. Just before we reached the border where the train stopped, an officer of the army put his head into the compartment evidently looking for some one. I was in a condition of mind to cry out, "I am the man you're looking for; take me and shoot me and have it over with." After what seemed to me minutes—it was only seconds—he withdrew, and I heaved a long drawn sigh of relief.

When the train stopped at the border we were all compelled to pass an examination that took a long while, though the government had not at that time instituted the rigorous examinations of a later date. While thus detained during a transit from one room to another I saw my watcher talking with an official. He was pointing to some one or something, and I was sure he was pointing at me. But in another moment I knew he had not seen me, for on catching sight of me I saw him suddenly make an effort to appear unconcerned.

There has been no moment in my life when I have felt such exquisite happiness and relief as when I found myself beyond German territory and rolling along on the rails in France in the direction of Paris. I was convinced that if my watcher was employed by the German government to arrest me he would have done so before I got out of Germany. My theory was that I was a suspect, but proof against me had not been directed. Likely the man had been directed to keep me in sight to note any act on my part that would indicate treason to the government. Not having discovered any such act, he had felt obliged to allow me to leave the country.

Well, I got safely to Paris, where I found greater commotion than in Berlin. At the same hotel where I stopped was an American family, Mrs. Turnlee and her two daughters. She approached me soon after my arrival and asked me of the situation in Germany, being anxious about her husband, who was there. I gave her that information I had, but it was not such as to reassure her. I became acquainted with her daughters—an introduction was dispensed with, considering the troublous times—and we became quite chummy. The elder, Miss Lillian Turnlee, and I took a desperate fancy to each other the moment we met, and I prolonged my stay in Paris in order to remain near her.

Some ten days after my arrival, Mrs. Turnlee received a letter from her husband from London, stating that he had succeeded in leaving Germany, and since matters in England had required his attention he had concluded to go there instead of Paris. His family were instructed to join him there, and they would all sail for home as soon as they could secure passage.

Before getting away from Paris, Mrs. Turnlee received another letter from her husband informing her that communication with America had been almost entirely cut off, and if she preferred Paris to London she might remain there until he could get a passage home. Mrs. Turnlee and her daughters very much preferred Paris to London, and wrote that they would remain where they were.

In Miss Lillian Turnlee I met my fate, and within a few weeks after my arrival in Paris we were engaged. I was acceptable to the mother, and my fiancée was naturally anxious that I should make a good impression on her father. She wrote him that she was engaged to the "loveliest man on earth" and was sure he would approve of her choice. As to that I well knew nothing could be determined till he saw me.

A time came when Mr. Turnlee succeeded in securing passage on a liner bound for New York and wrote his family to come at once to London. I found it convenient to go with them—indeed, they felt the need of a man's services on the journey. We crossed the channel at night with the lights darkened and arrived in London the next morning. I separated from my friends at the railway station, going to my favorite hotel, having arranged to call on them in the evening and meet my future father-in-law.

I have said that my getting safely out of Germany was the most of greatest happiness and relief of my life. The moment of greatest excitement and happiness was when I met Mr. Turnlee. The whole family were present. Lillian took me by the hand and led me to her father. He was standing at me as if he had seen a monster. I remained his gaze in kind. His family, especially Lillian, weened.

"What object had you in shadowing me in Berlin," he asked eagerly, "and afterwards on the train?"

"My dear dad," I said, "I supposed you were shadowing me."

There was a silence (during which he and I stared at each other, while the family gaped first at one, then at the other of us).

"All I have to say to you, young man," said Mr. Turnlee, "is that you caused me the fright of my life. I expected every minute that you were about to turn me over to the police. Can it possibly be that you are not a German spy?"

"Such I supposed you to be. I never dreamed that you were an American and the father of the loveliest girl in the world."

By this I broke in upon the antagonism Mr. Turnlee and I felt for each other; Lillian pushed me toward her father; he put out his hand, and we began a hasty dialogue on the incidents of our mutual mistake. I am happy to say that I soon secured his good will and his approval as a son-in-law.

We all sailed together for America, and Lillian and I are now man and wife.

These Men Will Help You Decide

Are you liable to be selected for service under the Military Service Act?

The answer to this question is being made readily available for you. Remember that the first class to be called includes only men between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, who are unmarried or widowers without children, those married after July 6, 1917, being deemed single for the purposes of the Act.

Medical Boards are now being established throughout Canada. These Boards will examine, free of charge and obligation, all men who wish to be examined as to their physical fitness for military service. They will tell you in a very short time whether your physical condition absolves you from the call or makes you liable for selection.

It is important that you obtain this information as soon as possible. A certificate of unfitness from a Medical Board will secure for you freedom from responsibility under the Military Service Act from any Exemption Tribunal. A certificate of fitness will not preclude an appeal for exemption on any ground.

In order that you may be able to plan your future with certainty, visit a Medical Board as soon as possible and find out if you are liable to be selected. You and your employer are interested as well as yourself.

JAPANESE WOMEN PROGRESS.

Have Invaded Many Occupations
Formerly Exclusive to Men.

Women of Japan do not spend all their time and talents arranging flowers and embroidering beautiful kimonos, however much those of us who have never visited "The Flowery Kingdom" may think of those two occupations as employing the greater part of their days. The Japanese woman of these present times is marching straight ahead, keeping step as far as possible with her sisters of western lands. She, too, is finding her way into fields which have hitherto been supposed to be open to men only. A Japanese paper interested in the question recently estimated that the women of the country are engaged in no less than 64 occupations, which not so long ago were considered as belonging exclusively to men.

For example, Japanese women have gone into railroad work. They are occupying posts as cashiers, bookkeepers, and ticket sellers. The Imperial Railway Bureau is credited with employing some 4,000 of them in such positions. The Imperial Arsenal, too, employs a number of women, but there the work is extremely hard. The banks are finding their services valuable, although they have not yet reached the point of paying them a good wage. Still they furnish their women employees with working clothes and lunches, in addition to their salaries. Two such institutions, the Bank of Japan and the Hypothec Bank employ approximately 125 each. These women also share in the semiannual bonuses which are common features of the industrial and mercantile life of the country. Many women are employed in the telephone companies. Many more earn good wages by typewriting. In fact, the typists are said to have about the best positions of all. The salaries paid to actresses do not compare favorably with those to be had by feminine members of that profession in western countries. Women have found their way into professional fields as well; they have become journalists, novelists, musi-

Mega-phone Methods
If you had a voice like thunder, with a megaphone attached you could not reach so many people as you can through our voice mail.
You have not got the value but our paper is at your service all the year around.

The Right Time.

The right time to reach the members of the family is when they are at home, and the right way to reach them is through the advertising columns of the paper that goes into the homes. There are other methods of advertising that enjoy a certain transitory popularity, because they are new or novel, but the oldest, wisest and most successful advertisers tie their faith to the home newspaper. When people are away from their homes, there are a thousand things to divert their attention, but an advertisement read in the quiet of the family circle will be read and remembered.

ciens, artists, and teachers. Also, they have become professors of the art of flower arrangement and ceremonies peculiar to their land. The school teachers are especially honored. In fact, they have to fill out their not munificent salaries with the respect and social recognition which is lavished upon them.

The leader in the education of women in Japan is Miss Umeo Tsuda, a graduate of Bryn Mawr College, who was one of the first five girls sent by the Government of her country to the United States to study. She is now principal of what is considered to be the best school for girls in all Japan. The courses of study there are modeled after the curriculum of her American alma mater, with both required courses and electives. Six hours a week are devoted to the study of English subjects, three hours to the study of the English language, the other three to English literature.

Miss Tsuda founded her school some 16 years ago and, during that time, 224 pupils have been graduated from it. So high has been the standing maintained, that the Department of Education of the Empire grants them licenses to teach in its schools, without the formality of examinations. No other school is thus honored, so it is said. Over 80 are now occupying posts as teachers in high schools and colleges of the land.

One Japanese woman is so interested in affairs of state that she sometimes takes a seat in the gallery when the Diet is in session and, practically always, when her husband, who is the Prime Minister of the nation, speaks. Not many of her countrywomen have yet adopted that custom, however.

Summer Suits in Java.

White and khaki suits are about the only kind worn in Java. The white drill is made up into regulation style two-piece suits, but the so-called "tutup" (meaning "closed up") coat, which is closely buttoned up to the chin but is worn without shirt or collar or tie, is very popular there and still more so in the Malay States. The collar is quite stiff, with two buttons or studs, and the front of the coat has five to seven buttons. These are sometimes sewed on, sometimes detachable like those used with white and colored waistcoats, only larger. Many use silver nuggets or brass plates with gold instead of the flat pearl button.

These suits are very comfortable and cool, as there is nothing else worn on the upper body except what is known here as the singlet, an undershirt of cotton or wool. The Chinese tailors make these suits, furnishing material for $4.50 in Straits money or $2.55 Canadian currency. The buttons come separately at a cost of $0.30 to $0.50 Canadian, bringing the total up to, say, $2.75 to $3 for the "tutup" in drill. In khaki it costs about $2.70. The regulation two-piece suits, made of drill, cost a little more. When of better material their cost depends, of course, upon the kind of material used; but the best quality of cloth can be made up here by the Chinese tailors at surprisingly low prices, so that little if any summer-weight clothing for men is imported.

Men of Little Faith.

Since the battle is to the strong, there is good reason for Pierre Renaudel's recent rebuke to the faint-hearted. There are people in his own and other lands who are of too narrow a vision to see anything but the danger of a separate peace in the resurrection of a people. "O ye of little faith," he exclaims, "fearful or timid democrats who fear a separate peace for Russia, as if a people risen into freedom could abandon itself to dishonor and annihilation! Take confidence, and draw from events that lesson of fearlessness which you need!"

Fall Farrowed Pigs.

The earlier fall pigs are farrowed the better; hence sows that have not yet been bred should be prepared for breeding as soon as practicable. The early fall pig, because it can make greater use of fall and winter pasture, has a decided advantage over the late arrival, while at the same time its greater size enables it to better stand the winter weather.

MANKIND'S GREAT NEED IS MORE ANIMAL FOOD

Live Stock Raising and Its Relation to Cereal Byproducts.

By GEORGE W. WEBER in Weber's Weekly.

To continue to exist—that is the primordial demand of life. And to remain alive requires, first of all, subsistence—food. Clothing comes next, then shelter, then fuel. Science has gone far and wide in its study of human foodstuffs—to determine their relative values in dietetics. But, for the most part, this article has nothing to do with their conclusions, valuable as they are. More broadly, it will consider merely the relation of the two great foodstuff elements, which are:

Products of the soil—grain, vegetables, fruits.

Animal foodstuffs—meats, fish, eggs, butter.

Live stock—domestic animals propagated for food—live upon substantially the same vegetable products which human beings consume and require. Inasmuch as man and animals eat the same sort of vegetable products there is an actual competition between them for such vegetable foodstuffs as may be derived from the soil. Man, being the stronger, dominates and controls the production and supply of vegetable food products. From each year's crop, first of all, he takes what he requires, feeds himself, and permits what is left to go to feed live stock. Thus, it appears, that our live stock—our meat supply resource—is dependent in large part upon what man, having fed himself, leaves of the annual products of the soil. Of course there is other vegetation which live stock can be fed upon—vegetable matter which man does not require and cannot eat.

Live stock can be maintained and, to some extent, prepared for market by grazing.

Live stock can be raised and made marketable by feeding upon the byproducts from cereal and other vegetable crops.

Waste of Feeding Stuffs.

When live stock is grazed upon lands which cannot profitably be tilled and made to produce cereals or vegetables such live stock is a clear profit and an addition to human food supplies. But where good conditioned, tillable land is abandoned to grazing there is likely to be a definite loss of vegetable foodstuffs and their byproducts. In other words, land in proper condition can be made to produce more foodstuff values by cultivation than by use as pasture. However, this does not mean that soil areas should not have rest—or, better still, refertilization such as is brought about by use of it for pasturing live stock.

If the byproducts—the forage—arising from cereal and vegetable crops are not made use of to feed live stock, then the stock will have to live off of what is left of the cereals after human requirements are fully supplied. Thus the live stock or meat supply, leaving out of consideration that which is produced solely by grazing on untillable lands, would represent each year's surplus cereal crop. And a year of short crops—years when the cereal surplus is small—would bring about the slaughtering of stock, reducing the number to be fed.

The possibilities of byproduct forage feeding are far-reaching, almost incalculable. The department of agriculture's report 112 has much to say concerning the value of such products. I have space to quote merely this:

"The animal husbandry division, in co-operation with the bureau of crop estimates, has made a study of feeding stuffs, in which it is shown that a tremendous waste of feeding stuffs occurs annually on American farms. The total loss to farmers from the waste of corn fodder and straw amounts to about $102,800,000 each year. . . . A nation wide campaign to teach the value and food unit values of all the more common feeding stuffs would be a great step toward a more perfect agricultural system."

Farmers Should Act.

The bureau's suggestion of a nation wide campaign is well and good, and such propaganda work may become advisable; but, individual farmers should not wait for such a movement. They now know. In fact, the individual farmer who begins on his own account to use all of the byproducts of his cropping hitherto wasted will make larger profits than if he wait until all other farmers are induced to do likewise. The farmer or live stock raiser who is not utilizing all of the byproducts of his farm is not only losing money, but he is working an injury upon all the people of the United States. The efficient farmer is the one who utilizes every bit of green stuff that grows on his place and, after he harvests his grain crops, takes the residue and stores it in such a manner that it does not lose its worth and then transforms this into meat by feeding it to live stock.

American Live Stock Problem.
The true test of the American live stock problem is, What do American live stock conditions show when compared with what they might be?

I have shown that the report of the animal husbandry division estimates that the annual loss in waste of straw and fodder amounts to more than a hundred million dollars. It is not practicable to discuss the intricate phases of live stock feeding in so brief an article as this. Hundreds of pages have

COOKING POTATOES.

Waste That Comes With Paring and Boiling Before Boiling.

Paring and cooking is the most wasteful method, and added to this some cooks soak the potatoes in water after they are pared. Starting to cook them in cold water also adds to the amount of waste.

Twice as much nutritive matter is lost if paring is done before boiling as there is if it is done after boiling, not figuring the waste in cutting away the potato. The juices of the potato contain 85 per cent of the protein and 98 per cent of the ash, and these substances are easily extracted when the protection of the skin has been removed.

A pared potato soaked from three to five hours loses about three times as much of its mineral matter and seven times as much of its protein as one that is pared and immediately cooked.

In the most wasteful method of cooking, paring, soaking and starting to cook in cold water the loss of protein is 51 per cent and 39 per cent of ash.

When cooked with the skins on potatoes not soaked and dropped into boiling water lose only 1.6 per cent of protein and only 4.9 per cent of ash.

Baking and steaming are the most economical methods of cooking potatoes when fuel is considered. Potatoes cannot be baked well in a slow oven.

WHAT A GARDEN DID.

How One Ambitious Girl Added to Her Bank Account.

Eight years ago a twelve-year-old girl in Cleveland started a little garden for vegetables and flowers. Flowers she sold that year brought her $18.46. It was a great sum, and she could hardly wait until the next spring so she could get at that gold mine of hers again. The next year she almost doubled earnings. In the third year they soared to $50.10. Each year thereafter saw money roll in in increasing amounts. Last year she came out with $285.63. She was a capitalist and could talk with the calm superiority of the class.

"I am able to buy all my school books, clothe myself, spend some for pleasure and still add to my bank account."

A fine young woman. At twenty we can imagine her. She has no complaint in the world. Her garden is a pleasant place, friendly to self reliant young people, remunerative for labor and pains, filled with the sweet odor of flowers. Sorrow may come to her some day, but never the sense of helplessness. The garden has taught her, as school and her parents' counsel could not have, that always there is a way by which the wolf can be kept from the doorstep and by which despair is made an unknown quantity.

Battle of Dorking.

The battle of Dorking was an imaginary battle. In 1871, at the close of the Franco-Prussian war, Englishmen were reminded by the quick work done by Germany over France of the possibilities of invasion, and Sir George T. Chesney wrote an interesting and instructive narrative called "The Battle of Dorking, or the Reminiscence of a Volunteer," in which he depicted the imaginary scene of a great battle on English soil, which was won by the Germans. In short, the battle was the product of a military man's imagination, but it was so well worked out and so vividly described that as long as the German armies were in France the mention of the battle of Dorking was enough to make an Englishman shudder.

A Nautilus Explanation.

A New York woman, recording her impressions of a trip abroad, said: "One thing at least I learned. That was the meaning of 'windward' and 'leeward.' The captain of the liner I crossed on explained this difference to me in a way that, if a little vulgar, was yet unforgettable.

"Captain," I said, "I never can tell the difference between the windward and the leeward. Explain it to me, will you?"

"Well, madam," said the gruff old captain, "if I were to spit to the windward and you were to stand to the leeward of me you would be a fool."

How to Carry Water.

If you want to carry a full pail of water any distance without spilling or to carry water from one room to another in a fast dish or tray you should always have something floating on it. If it is drinking water a clean animal will do, and a flat piece of wood is the best thing for a pail. It is the little waves that arise from the water's lapping against the sides and then rushing to the other side that makes the water spill over. The faster steps this.

Helping Some.

Bill—I see that the theory that earthquakes accelerate the movement of glaciers has been proved by observation in Alaska recently. Oh—Oh course. Why, I'll bet some earthquakes would even make a champagne man.

Explained.

"Pa, what's the difference between 'insurance' and 'assurance'?"
"Well, the latter is what the agent has, and the former is what he tries to sell you."

He Saw It.

"There was a terrible accident at our house last night," said a wag. "As I was sitting in the dining room I happened to look out, and I saw the kitchen sink."

Let us not burden our remembrance with a heaviness that's gone.

Married

When a girl marries and enters into a strange environment she is confronted with a trying task. The experience of Marjorie Wilde is so comprehensively described by Theodore Dreiser in "Married" in September Cosmopolitan that every reader will appreciate it with sympathetic understanding.

Theodore Dreiser is the author of "The Genius," one of the best selling novels in the past ten years—a novel that created world-wide comment for its daring discussion of the artistic temperament.

This is Mr. Dreiser's first appearance in Cosmopolitan, and he has given it his best work.

The story is profusely illustrated by Howard Chandler Christy.

Undertakers' New Equipment

The establishment of The Wm. Thompson Co., Limited, Funeral Directors and Embalmers at No. 288 and 290 Front street, Belleville, is one of the most up-to-date in the country. From the standpoint of convenience, comfort, economy and taste, the parlors and the building itself are in the first class.

The woodwork and fitting of the Funeral Chapel and show-room are in white enamel and golden oak, and electric fixtures with alabaster globes throw a soft light over all. The chapel is situated in a secluded portion of the building and services can be held without interfering in any way with the regular business. When the visitor enters this room an atmosphere of sanctity impresses him.

This business was established thirty-five years ago by Mr. William Thompson, President of the Company, who also designed and built the elaborate system for the display of caskets.

At the rear of the show-room has been installed a modern elevator, thus connecting the mortuary with the chapel.

In the show-room is carried a complete line of high grade oak, mahogany and cloth covered caskets, casket hardware, robes and linings of the best known quality and most modern and most elegant designs. Here is also shown a line of steel vaults.

In the basement a private post mortem room is fitted with all modern equipment, and perfectly sanitary, all in white enamel finish, hot and cold water and cement floors. This is equipped with embalming tables and many convenient contrivances for facilitating the work of the undertaker.

A stock room and trimming room behind the mortuary serves as a store for keeping the working appliances, chemicals, cloths, etc., always at hand and in neat order.

In keeping with the time and in order to render perfect service, there has been installed a handsome motor hearse, mounted on a six-cylinder Studebaker Chassis, designed and built for The Wm. Thompson Co. by A. B. Greer & Son of London. This hearse is the latest accomplishment of the car builders' art, the interior being finished in black walnut.

This addition to their already large Undertaking Equipment enables them to supply motor conveyances at the same cost as former funerals to any distance.

There has also been added a new motor casket wagon.

This firm still retains its up-to-date horse drawn conveyances for those who do not desire motors, thus making the equipment second to none in the country.

The embalming and demi surgery work is in charge of capable and experienced attendants.

With the new arrangements and equipment, The Wm. Thompson Co. can more conveniently look after the business entrusted to them, and this firm is to be congratulated on what is beyond a shadow of a doubt one of the most thoroughly modern and, at the same time, artistic Undertaking Establishments.

Letters from Our Soldiers

Mrs. J. Burns, Madoc, Ont.

Dear Mrs. Burns—By the time you receive this letter you will have heard of the death of your son, Sgt. J. E. Burns, and I hope I may be able to give you some of the details which I know you must be longing to hear. On the 15th of August, our battalion made an attack on a strong German position. Your son was going forward with his platoon, and had just got across the enemy front line when he got hit by a shell which wounded Capt. Walker and lance corporal Rea at the same time. He was carried out and taken as far as the casualty clearing station, where everything that is possible was done for him, but they were unable to save his life.

I cannot express the esteem in which your son was held. He was without doubt one of the most popular and highly thought of men in the battalion. His work was always of the best, especially in the attack on Vimy Ridge, where he did brilliantly and was recommended by the colonel for the military medal. He would certainly have been given his commission if his career had not been cut short. Please accept my most heartfelt sympathy, and that of all ranks of D Company in your great loss. He died for a great cause, and it is men like your son who have made the name of Canada something to be proud of. Yours very sincerely,

P. L. HALL, Major,
O. C. 'D' Company

France, Sept. 6, 1917

Mrs. J. Burns, Madoc, Ont.

Dear Madam—I know that Major Hall has already written to you of the death of your son, Sgt. J. E. Burns, who died of wounds on the 15th of August, but I thought I should like to add a few words, partly to tell you of his burial place, chiefly to add a small tribute to the affection and esteem in which he was universally held.

He was very badly wounded, as you probably know. A shell hit close to him while we were advancing through the ruins of a village. It wounded Capt. Walker who was in charge of D Co., and also your son. He was brought out as quickly as possible and hastened back to No. 6 Casualty Clearing Station, but he was too seriously wounded for anything to be of any avail, and he died there the same day. He was buried in a beautiful cemetery by the chaplain attached to the clearing station.

It is a very great loss to us all. The men in his company, especially his fellow N. C. O's, are disconsolate. "Bunny" as he was always called, was one of the first favorites in every company. Both men and officers loved him, and we were looking forward to his getting a commission, which he richly deserved. Courageous at all times; he looked after the men under him as if they had been his brothers. No one deserved more the affection which he had for them.

His was a splendid career and his death has crowned its glory. It was very like the life of the Master Himself, short and full of noble actions, and a short time of suffering too, then death in defense of all that he held dear. Truly we may be quite sure that God will grant him a due reward, and we shall meet him once more around the throne of the Father. I always feel that death has no terrors for one here, but how thankful and glad we shall be to meet these lads once again and feel that nothing more can part us. And your son has left behind him the fragrant memory of a splendid life, a memory which will never fade.

May God in his great mercy comfort you in your sorrow in the prayer of us all, and especially of

Yours faithfully,

C. STUART, Capt.,
Chaplain 24th Can. Bn. V.R.C.

No. 6 Casualty Clearing Station,
C. G. F. France, 17-8-17

Dear Mrs. Burns:

You will have heard of your sad loss long before you receive this letter. Your son, Sgt. Burns, was brought here on Aug. 15th, seriously wounded in the stomach, and though all possible was done for him he passed away the same day. He did not leave any messages, he did not realize how ill he was. You will be glad to know that he did not suffer much pain and that he was in a nice comfortable bed and had all that he wished for. He will be buried in the cemetery here and his grave will be marked by a cross and nicely kept. I may not give you the name of the place, but the war office will if you wish for it. His belongings will be sent you later through the authorities.

With sympathy in your grief,
A. M. KARNE,
Sister in charge.

Holiness Movement Interim Injunction

Appellate Division dissolves interim order made by Mr. Justice Sutherland. The Second Divisional Court of Appeal at Osgoode Hall, Toronto, has allowed the appeal of R. C. Horner, Bishop of the Holiness Movement Church, and G. L. Monahan, secretary, from the interim injunction restraining the former from exercising the functions of his office. The plaintiffs, A. T. Warren and S. A. York, alleged that there was a General Conference in December, 1916, at which Bishop Horner was deposed, but it was argued that there was not a quorum present at any time a vote was taken.

The Appellate Division of four judges could not understand what irreparable injury could have occurred had the injunction not been granted; especially in view of the undertaking that Mr. Horner would not exercise the functions of bishop until upheld in his contention.

Events of The War in Brief

It now seems quite clear that the war will run into next summer at least. The military situation and recent statements of men high in authority all point in this direction. Consider for a moment the military position.

On the western front the closing month of good campaigning weather finds the situation practically as it was at the beginning of the year, thus clearly indicating Anglo-French inability to force the German lines so long as Russia remains military impotent; and Russia is likely to remain that way for a long time to come. The Italians have made progress on their front, but they have so far come a long way short of proving their ability to force a decision on the south. It is so long since anything has been heard from the Saloniki army that everything relating to that force seems like ancient history now; and the recent statement that a considerable part of Greece has been put under martial law, thus indicating that despite change of kings Greece is not yet pro-ally shows the reason for inactivity on the Balkan front. Nothing can be done there so long as a possibly hostile Greece lies in the rear.

All these things point to one inevitable conclusion—that a decision cannot be forced until the whole might of the United States is thrown into the scale; and that will not come before next spring.

Everybody to be Paid but the Newspaper

At an expense of fifteen thousand per annum for secretaries, the food controller's office at Ottawa is crowding the editorial desks of Canada with literature. To quote the accompanying letter: "The food controller's office believes that the enclosed secretaries are calculated to assist in impressing the public with gravity of conditions. The publication of these fillers and other informative and educational matter sent to you by this office will be greatly appreciated." No doubt, but why should the newspapers be expected to accept "appreciation" as payment while officials in the office draw down fifteen thousand dollars or more per annum of the country? There is not a newspaper in Canada that is not prepared to do its full share in placing before the people the seriousness of the situation and of urging upon them the conservation of food, but just why they should be placed on a basis different from officials who, it is generally felt, are overpaid, not with "appreciation" but with hard cash, is the question. If this can be satisfactorily solved those professional be capable of doing so should come forward—Exchange.

A Great Hit

The Family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal certainly made a popular hit when they issued their new war map of the European fighting area. It is said they are overwhelmed with orders. The map is not for sale at any price, but is given free to all who pay a year's subscription to that great paper. The price for the full year is $1.25, map included. It is a wonderful value, and it is no wonder they are securing thousands of new readers. Renewals alone, many months ahead, are being sent in order to get the map now. The map is very complete, and alone well worth the price asked for both paper and map.

Get Behind the Wheel of a Ford and Drive

TRY it just once! Ask your friend to let you "pilot" his car on an open stretch. You'll like it, and will be surprised how easily the Ford is handled and driven.

If you have never felt the thrill of driving your own car, there is something good in store for you. It is vastly different from just riding—being a passenger. And especially so if you drive a Ford.

Young boys, girls, women and even grandfathers—thousands of them—are driving Ford cars and enjoying it. A Ford stops and starts in traffic with exceptional ease and smoothness, while on country roads and hills its strength and power show to advantage.

Buy a Ford and you will want to be behind "the wheel" constantly.
